Clinics defy abortion "gag rule"

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Family planning agencies in Massachusetts said Wednesday they will risk losing federal money by continuing to inform patients on abortion, despite Thursday's start of new federal rules prohibiting abortion counseling.

But Leslie Laurie of the Family Planning Center of Western Massachusetts, told a Statehouse news conference the centers didn't plan to break the law. Instead, she said, they were attempting to restructure their programs to stay within the the federal rules, which opponents have labeled a "gag rule."

The rules prohibit workers at family planning clinics that receive federal money from advising patients about abortion.

It was supported by President Bush.

Mary Russell, co-chairman of the Massachusetts Family Planning Association, said accusations by abortion opponents that family planning clinics advocate abortion over other alternatives are false.

"We will not compromise the services to our clients," Russell said. "This is an attack on services for low-income women. We will continue to provide a full range of options and information for every one of our clients."

She and Laurie said agencies are ready to return the federal money if it is found they are violating the new rules.

The Weld administration announced Wednesday it is prepared to make up for any lost federal money, as much as $3.1 million, if federal officials withhold the dollars from Massachusetts clinics.

"This administration is absolutely opposed to implementation of the federal gag rule," Barbara Roderick, a member of Gov. William F. Weld's Commission on Women and executive director of the Massachusetts Nurses Association.

Roderick read a statement from Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci promising to restore the money if it is cut by Washington.

Massachusetts has 10 family planning agencies that operate 77 clinics throughout the state.

Officials of the Massachusetts Family Planning Association said none of its member clinics actually perform abortions.

The clinics also provide pre-natal care, pregnancy testing, birth control and screening for cancer and sexually transmitted diseases. Only about 10 percent of the clients who receive services are pregnant, the officials said.

Dr. Gary Gross, who works for Action for Boston Community Development, said he will continue to offer a full range of pregnancy counseling.

"The gag rule is built on the false and insulting concept that telling people their medically sound and completely legal options concerning pregnancy is encouraging abortion," Gross said.

"The destruction of structure led to the famine," says Mohamed, who said he believes the absence of government made it impossible for Somalia to produce its exports and engage in trade to meet its economic needs.

The Help Somalia group's position statement says that each day, 1000 to 2000 people, mainly children, die in Somalia.

"Seeing little bodies on the ground [is disturbing]," said sophomore Isatou Bojang, an undeclared major who represented the African Student Association at the meeting. "Over the summer, I saw a lot of news about Somalia, and it was really sad. I really felt that I could do something."

According to the position statement, these deaths are due to starvation, malnutrition and various diseases.

"The acute problem at the moment is starvation," says Mohamed. "What is needed is to flood the country with food."

According to Mohamed, the food brought to Somalia is distributed in the cities, forcing starving people to travel, often causing death before they reach the cities.

"People in remote areas don't have access to that food," says Mohamed. "What is needed is to stop that process."

In addition to supporting an increase of food, the committee promotes long-term goals such as peacekeeping, medical care and the economic development of the nation.

"Six months down the line, another catastrophe could arise," says Mitchell. "Throwing food at a problem will only make it go away for a little while."

In an earlier meeting, publicity and fundraising groups were formed to promote the committee's goals.

By setting up an information table in the Campus Center, petitions were signed, approximately 300 letters were written to Congress and about $300 was donated to the Red Cross and the International Medical Corps.

On October 23, Amherst College will have a "Somalia Day," which will include speakers, dancing and other related activities. On October 24, an "Afrique Benefit" dance will be held in Northampton.

On October 26, Hazel McFerson will speak at Amherst College on conflict resolution in Somalia. In addition, the Help Somalia Committee will hold its next meeting on October 13 at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center.

Mitchell encourages students to "be involved in the local area to raise funds, to publicize the issue, and to help organize activities."

"Governments cannot act without the public pressure," adds Mohamed.

For whom the bell tolls

At the University of New Hampshire the quest for "political correctness" is marching to a new tune. Namely, whether the chimes which play each day on campus represent music of all cultures.

Protesters have claimed the songs, which are selected and played by 40-year carillon veteran Frank Heald, are too Christian in orientation and do not represent every student on campus.

The University temporarily silenced Heald's playing, in response to the complaints, and now have new guidelines set up on what can and cannot be played. Now the selections must be expanded to include national anthems from all over the world and Heald should avoid "sensitive" songs which are perceived as inappropriate, such as "Onward Christian Soldier."

One professor who protested the music felt that to ensure the separation of church and state no religious songs should be played. "I don't think there is much diversity there [on the campus chimes]," she told The Boston Globe.

Some on campus think the whole issue is ridiculous. Ali Jutta, the editor of the campus newspaper told The Globe, "it seems like the whole thing is being blown out of proportion. You can't even have a Christian hymn played on a carillon without it becoming a controversy."

Hi. I'm Bob Vila and welcome to "This Old HUD"

Mark Vane, a columnist for The Daily Texan, the student newspaper of the University of Texas, has come up with some interesting suggestions for Gov. Bill Clinton, if he is elected President, concerning the filling of Cabinet positions.

Vane calls for Willie Nelson to be Secretary of Agriculture, because of his work with Farm Aid and his overdue income taxes.

As for Secratery of Housing and Urban Development, Vane looks to none other than Bob Vila, host of This Old House. Vane writes, "give him a tape measure, a band saw and some wood glue and all of the nation's homeless could have their own breakfast nook and patio deck."

Vane goes on to call for Dan Quayle as Education Secretary, Angela Lansbury as Secretary of Health and Human Services and Jerry Lewis as Labor Secretary. "Every time the coal miners go on strike [Lewis] could stay up for 30-some-odd-hours in a sweaty tuxedo and raise some cash."

And, the new Secretary of Defense, Sadam Hussein. "He kept clear of the entire U.N. forces during the Persian Gulf War, even when everyone knew he was the prime target. Now that's defense."

Mr. Vane obviously has not been receiving WSBK TV-38 in Austin or he would have witnessed Boston Bruins defenseman Ray Bourque, who is clearly a better defender than Mr. Hussein.

But can she spell potato?

Speaking of the University of Texas, it appears Texas Railroad Commissioner Lena Guerrero, who is up for re-election, lied about her graduation from the University.

The September 17 edition of The Daily Texan reports that Guerrero left UT 19 hours [credits] shy of graduation. On the front page of the same addition, Guerrero's transcript was published.

The transcript showed Guerrero seemed to have some trouble hitting the books during her stay in Austin. Guerrero flunked Gov 312, Gov 335N, Gov 340M and Com 321K (twice). Some how Guerrero did manage to achieve a 2.5 grade point average.

Hopefully the electorate will not lose faith in their leaders because of this. Even though Dan Quayle can't spell potato, Massachusetts senior Senator Ted Kennedy knows Spuds McKenzie very well.

UM women lack services

EWC counselor seeks programs for women of color

By SHYAMALA IVATURY
Collegian Correspondent

In the past three years, the Everywoman's Center has lost five programs specifically addressing the needs of low-income women and women of color due to the lack of funding, according to the Center's latest annual report.

These programs include the Third World Women's Program, WAGES, and Bridge Program. The WAGES program provided services for working women.

This leaves the Everywoman's Center with no programs that are readily available for women of color and low-income women, according to Sage Freechild, the coordinator of the Counselor Advocate Program at the Everywoman's Center.

Two of the most important programs designed to combat violence against women are the Educator Advocate Program and the Counselor Advocate Program. In a recent interview Freechild described the program as being a service for victims and survivors. The program has a 24-hour rape crisis hotline at 545-0800.

The C.A. program also provides short-term peer counseling, legal and medical advocacy and plays a role in defining university policies.

The services that are now provided do not meet the needs of women of color, who are referred to other agencies, according to Freechild. She said she recognizes the "service gap" within the center as lacking in services, such as the absence of multilingual counseling, and the need for more women of color as Educator and Counselor Advocates.

Freechild also mentioned the need to make the center more mulitictural. There is only one woman of color on the professional staff and two trainees of the C.A. program who are women of color.

"There is a need for creating an inviting atmosphere for minorites," Freechild said.

This would include making the application process more accessible for women of color, Freechild said.

The rape crisis hotline serviced about 330 callers in the past fiscal year, 29 of whom identified themselves as women of color. This is a relatively low number compared to the statistics given by the FBI, which states women of color get raped four times more than white women.

Currently there are no plans to reinstate the programs that were removed except for the counseling program. There are no other agencies at the University of Massachusetts that provide direct services for women of color.

Local volunteer groups attempt to tap UM students for services

By DAVID LaFONTANA
Collegian Correspondent

Local volunteer groups had an opportunity to recruit interested students at yesterday's University of Massachusetts Community Service Program volunteer fair in the Campus Center.

Representatives from 42 community and eight campus organizations set up information tables for students interested in signing up various volunteer programs.

Program coordinator Diane Huebner-Dillon ran a similar fair last spring, but said she wanted to try to hold one earlier in the school year this time. "That way students have two semesters to get involved," Huebner-Dillon said.

Organizations like AIDS Allies, the Salvation Army and the Western Massachusetts Girl Scouts all rubbed elbows for the afternoon. Peer advisor Kristin Wooldridge explained the purpose of the fair, and the Volunteer program in general.

"We're here to make sure the different groups don't overlap each other," Wooldridge said. "We don't want one group starting a service or program another one already has."

"The program is important for students. With it, they can get experience for their major, while at the same time helping out in the community," said Wooldridge.

A table was set up for Congressman John W. Olver, and case worker John Bunelle echoed Wooldridge. "We're here looking for students interested in internships. Their work not only helps us, but helps them on their resume," Bunelle said.

Bunelle explained how Olver helps students as well as the other groups present. "[Olver] helps volunteer groups look for grants, as well as helps students look for loans."

Another table was set up for Alpha Phi Omega, the co-ed service fraternity on campus. Lisa Megna explained the fraternity's role. "We do all kinds of services. We're doing Las Vegas night to raise money for the library, and we also do things like blood drives."

Fraternity member Emily Gitelson said she felt the fair was long overdue. "We've been a service organization so long it's nice to see an organized effort.

Turnout for the fair was still slow at 1:30 p.m, but program coordinator Huebner-Dillon didn't seemed worried.

"It's still early. Still, we've had about a hundred people so far," Huebner-Dillon said.

Virginia Christenson of the Family Planning Council of Western Massachusetts said she was dissapointed at the outcome. "We had a much higher turnout at Smith and Mount Holyoke. I'm not sure how many UMass students even know about this," Christenson said.

Tales of times spent far away

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Correspondent

From Kenya to Switzerland to Taiwan, the University of Massachusetts International Program can help send you abroad to not only expand your academic experiences but also to learn more about yourself, according to students who have participated in the program.

Laurie Pascucci, a senior marketing major, describes her experience in Italy as "the best, most happy time in my life."

MaryElise Lamet, associate director for the Program, said the program is affordable and relevant to all majors. But interested students shouldn't delay in considering where they'd like to go.

"Students should not hold back from going, but they should begin planning now," advises Lamet.

The International Program sends almost 800 students a year to study both language and culture in foreign countries. School of management and hotel, restaurant and travel administration majors also benefit from overseas studies in English-speaking countries.

Hope Daley and Kerry Hagerty are both senior HRTA majors who spent their summer in Switzerland. They took academic classes, but said they gained most of their knowledge through traveling and hands-on experience.

"The Swiss people there weren't very accepting of Americans — it was a very gradual process," Daley said. Hagerty said although the people in Switzerland weren't overly friendly, the fun they had far outweighed any negativity.

India proved to be an exciting place for Neil Heffernan, a computer science major at Amherst College. He said people were eager to meet him because his skin color made him a curiosity factor.

He attended the Indian Institute of Technology at Delhi, which is ranked seventh in the world for academics. In fact, he said cheating is socially acceptable. He also said "India can be intimidating, but I learned a lot about myself. This was more important than the academics."

England is a big draw for overseas students. The idea of studying in an English-speaking countries appeals to many.

An imaginary conversation between very real people

"Personally, I think we would've been better off if Bush had dropped out when Buchanan decided to run," scowled Kent O'Brien as he bit into a tri-county fair sandwich with reckless abandon.

Eustacia Fields poked at her salad with a fork. "Yeah, that's all we need, another fascist for president. Why don't we just try to elect Benito Mussolini?"

"He's dead," I offered.

"And he's a wop too," mumbled Kent through an unchewed mass of meat-like substance.

Nathan
CRICK

"You are such a pig, Kent," chastised Eustacia as she dropped her fork. "How can you be so blatantly prejudiced against people? Just because someone is Italian doesn't give you the right to degrade them."

Kent swallowed. "For one thing, Eustacia, I'm talking about Mussolini for Pete's sake. And I am not prejudiced against anyone, my dear with the wounded heart. I don't care what they are, I just think everyone has the same potential to be made a little fun of in the same way. That's freedom of speech," he stated, emphasizing his statement by pointing in her face.

Eustacia sighed. "That is so hypocritical. You oppose stuff like the NEA but condone blatant slander. For Christ's sake, I. . ."

"Hey, God's on OUR side," he interrupted with a grin.

"Oh shut up about God already, I am sick of hearing all that crap," she said angrily, stabbing a piece of lettuce with her fork. "It's like the divine right of kings all over again. They're just trying to convince us that the election is all up to God so we will just stay home and not do anything. They're treating us like goddamn children," she said as she scooped the lettuce in her mouth.

Kent shrugged. "I didn't say they weren't, but what works works."

"That's kind of sad, isn't it?," I asked.

"Sad has nothing to do with it," demanded Kent. "It's reality. It's not sad or happy or wrong or right. It just is. That's what galls me about you liberals, you all want to create some new world out of the old. You're just spinning your wheels."

"That's a really sick attitude," she retorted. "How can you believe in such a philosophy — it's so callous and utterly selfish. Without welfare and public funding half our nation would be dying in the streets. If you weren't so upper class you wouldn't think that, hell you'd probably be grabbing up all the welfare checks you could scrounge."

"Yeah, I probably would," he nodded.

Eustacia put her head in her hands. "Will you stop agreeing with me for Christ's sakes!"

Kent smiled. "Christ is in our party, not yours."

"Aaaagh!" she cried. "How can I argue with someone like this?" she asked me, waving her hands around. "Who either just agrees with my criticisms or just brings up God?!"

Just don't argue with someone like that, I suggested.

"Exactly," agreed Kent.

"What do you mean, `exactly?'" demanded Eustacia.

Kent took the last bite of his sandwich and chased it down with some overly-sweetened Franklin Lemonade. "That's how even that liberal shmuck Bush is going to win this year. Everyone will get so frustrated with arguing with him and Quayle that most of the voters will just stay away from politics and decide to stick with what they're used to. It doesn't matter if they like Bush or not, everyone's always scared of something new. All he has to do is pretend he knows what he's arguing about and he'll still be President."

Eustacia scowled. "So why do you support the party, simply because it is able to fool more people? Don't you think there should be more to politics than deceiving those people you are trying to serve?"

Kent shrugged. "I'm not supporting anything, I'm just stating what's true," he said, picking up the paper. "Deception IS politics, and don't tell me the Democrats think any different."

Eustacia groaned. "You are such a pain, Kent."

"To each his own, but you know I'm right," he replied from behind the newsprint. We all paused silently for a few seconds.

"You're depressing," sighed Eustacia. "I'm not hungry anymore."

Kent looked up. "My point exactly," he smiled.

Drop the blind ideologies and create real change

As a transfer student I am dismayed with the recent events that have taken place at the University of Massachusetts. Truly the question should be posed: How are we to prepare for the challenges of the 21st century? Especially when the atmosphere of hatred, division and confusion still permeates a campus as diverse and committed to fostering global awareness.

Kenneth
MAISONET

The accusations that the administration is racist in light of the many changes that have and continue to manifest themselves everyday must be challenged. I have witnessed the divisive mentality of those who consider themselves "student activists," who misalign and misinform the student body with preposterous allegations of widespread institutional racism. This is falsity that needs to be addressed. The illusion of racism is underestimated when certain individuals or groups claim to have unalienable rights in the context of oppressing the oppressors. Can we see the contradiction of this pervading philosophy at work on today's campuses? I have made the following observations:

I am a Puerto Rican Internationalist. I feel very strongly about my cultural heritage and have gone to great lengths to understand the world around me. Since I arrived, I've taken the initiative to volunteer my time and input in hopes of contributing to the students as a resource person. In my opinion, students at UMass are very open-minded to diversity and will become more so over time. However, students have not taken the responsibility of being accountable and committed to articulating and submitting their views in a positive, educational and resourceful manner. How are we to become agents of social change if we do not broaden our perspective and move into positions of concentrated power that will provide the base from which to positively influence and contribute to the community, the world?

I am convinced that UMass is neither a racist nor fascist institution that perpetuates racist oppressive ideology as some so-called student leaders purport. The need to acknowledge that racist elements abound within the perimeters of this institution is more constructive. Secondly, in order to be accountable to the overwhelming needs of students attending UMass, we must look within its very walls. The faculty in many ways have failed to meet and address the needs of students.

There must be accountability on the part of faculty who have not resolved internal conflicts within their own profession. Students are in need of role models and mentorship programs, which are key in guiding and supporting students throughout their four-year term. This is not to say all faculty are subject to this critique, but students are not just numbers or grant projections: they embody the spirit of the future. Please reinvest your energy in the lives of the future! What type of message are we sending to the younger generation? What is the perception of our actions and inactions? And to take matters further, what impact will this have as we move toward a global society? The role of peacekeeper, mediator, ambassador are skills and strengths that are constantly ignored.

There is a sharp contrast between leading and following. I have seen first-year students become indoctrinated by causes and movements and completely lose perspective on who and what they aspire to be. This is happening more frequently across many campuses nationwide, and it denies the students the opportunity to gain wisdom and knowledge as to who they are within the the universe. This is a cultural tragedy. It defeats the purpose of education, which is the primary goal of life — to relentlessly pursue the Truth. . . How else are we to prepare the future generations and build better communities?

Will the demise of eurocentrism, conservatism and capitalism bring true peace? Will armed revolution, socialism and globalism bring true peace? Are we seeing life through very clouded myopic lenses? We should pursue life with a passion, with an understanding of who we are in this vast universe. Bitterness, hatred, confusion, resentment and misinformation only hinder the process of change, obstructing and destroying the inner voice within crying out for a reason, a meaning to this complicated web we call life. So much can be accomplished if every one could be accountable — students, faculty and administration. The old adage "time is precious" comes to mind. . . I believe that life and time are synchronous and that the universe will never be given the chance to experience "rebirth," but will experience an absolute end. . . Yes, absolutely! "Guard well your spare moments. They are like uncut diamonds. Discard them and their value will never be known. Improve them and they will become the brightest gems in a useful life," wrote Ralph Waldo Emerson

The choice is truly yours as to whether you personally take a serious inventory of your life — have all your heart-felt questions been answered? If not, why? I appeal to those engaged in the struggle of expression and recognition to consider for a moment: what are you doing in the present that will have an impact on tomorrow? Have you pursued the Truth? Are you struggling for a freedom that is indefinite? I have met my reality, my destiny and discovered more to life pursuing the Truth. You may ask what is Truth? I say to you keep searching your heart though will not find it within. "Freedom is not the right to do as you please but the liberty to do as you ought." Do you recognize the source of this reference?

Might makes right — or does it?

My heart welled with pride last weekend at the football game when our sportsmanlike team gave the boys from Boston University a free extra quarter to try to win the game. It seems that some of the players on the opposing team hadn't enough time to "settle in" in our stadium, or perhaps they were "speculative" about getting involved in the game. Maybe the extra time would "significantly increase" their score and thus make the game more fair. A few of their players strolled into the end zone with the ball after the final buzzer, but since they tried we'll just give them the points.

If these words sound familiar it's because they were spoken by Jon Aronson, the Student Government Association's governmental affairs chairman [Collegian, Sept. 28]. Aronson was speaking about the SGA elections and the decision he spoke about was unfair. If it would be ludicrous to conceive of arbitrarily allowing the opposite team more time to play because they had a bad day, then how can we accept the fact that the SGA elections were postponed? This gives the unprepared, less interested candidates more time and penalizes those who have been hard at work on their campaign.

I question the legality of the SGA decision. Was the decision made in an open session, or were our campaigns derailed behind closed doors?

An injustice has been done at a university that prides itself on fairness and attempts to extoll the virtues of democracy. It is the duty of the student government to parallel the governments of society so that we might learn to be leaders and represent our constituents fairly. Unfortunately, the SGA has acted unjustly, and possibly illegally. Perhaps the SGA parallels other governments too closely.

Boston Church of Christ teaches false doctrine

There is a new RSO on campus named Upside Down, and the group is associated with the Springfield Church of Christ, otherwise known as the Boston Church of Christ. Many questions have been raised concerning this church. Is it a Christian church or a cult? Before making any conclusions, a question central to scripture must be asked: is their doctrine of salvation sound? After all, as Paul the Apostle declared (Gal 1:8), ". . . even if we, or an angel from heaven, should preach a gospel other than the one we have preached to you, let him be eternally condemned!" Therefore, the Church of Christ's doctrine must be compared with scripture.

The Church of Christ declares that at the point of water baptism a repentant person believing in Christ is met by God's grace and made pure from past sins. The evidence is prompt baptism after repentance in the book of Acts, specifically Acts 2:38, and Jesus's seeming support of the idea of salvation at baptism when he says "one must be born of water and the spirit." But. . .

Water baptism is a command. But the scriptures are straightforward in showing that salvation is essential for (and thus precedes) water baptism. Let's examine some priorities set forth in scripture.

Paul the Apostle, in settling a dispute, wrote: ". . . for Christ did not send me to baptize, but to preach the gospel. . ." (1Cor 1:17). Obviously the gospel's declaration receives priority over water baptism. Romans 1:6 explains why: ". . . [the gospel] is the power of God unto salvation for everyone who believes. . ." It is the gospel that saves those who believe in it. The question is when? At Repentance or water baptism?

A verse that comes to mind is Romans 10:9. Now things are pretty easy to understand. The verses say that if you "confess with your mouth 'Jesus is Lord' and believe in your heart that God raised Him from the dead, you will be saved." The verse does not declare "When you are baptised you will be saved." On the contrary, it is when you confess and believe. It seems like we could end the discussion right now. That's what I thought until someone asked "So why do verses like 1Peter 3:21 use the word 'baptism' to refer to what saves a person's soul?" Good question.

DIANE
D'AVANZO

Well, this same verse that comes into question is part of the answer. Here a very sharp distinction is made which the Boston Church of Christ does not recognize — water baptism is distinct from the saving baptism: ". . . an antitype which now saves us — baptism which is not the removal of filth from the flesh (water baptism) but the answer of a good conscience toward God (the saving confession of Romans 10:9)."

Peter calls "the answer of a good conscience" (or confession of Christ as Savior) a "saving baptism" because at that point the Holy Spirit, who brings salvation, functions like water to wash away sin. As 1Cor 12:13 states, ". . . we were all baptized by one Spirit (not by literal water) into one body (Christ)." Elsewhere in scripture the Spirit is likened to washing water. You don't believe me? Well, just look at the following:

Ephesians 5:26 — Jesus will sanctify the church by "cleansing her with the washing with water through the word." Titus 3:5 — "(God) saved us, through the washing of rebirth and renewal by the Holy Spirit." To clarify the Spirit/water distinction let's look at an analogy concerning circumcision.

Paul wrote (Rmans 2:28-9), "One is not a Jew. . . nor is circumcision that which is outward in the flesh; but one is a Jew inwardly, and circumcision is that of the heart in the Spirit. . ." The same with baptism: there are two — one is outward and ineffectual to the soul but symbolic of the inner which is of the Spirit and truly saves one's soul. Do you see the correlation?

The next question is: can the two be simultaneous? Peter in Acts 10 preached to some Gentiles. In 10:44 the Holy Spirit came upon them. In 10:47 they were water-baptized. Do you think the Holy Spirit can come upon unsaved men? Of course not! They were saved prior to water baptism! Likewise, in Acts 9:17 Saul was called Ananias' brother in the faith (was saved) prior to being water baptized in Acts 9:18. Do you see the pattern? They were all saved before they were baptized.

The great commission states in Matt 28:19, "Go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them. . ." How can one be a disciple unless one is saved? 1Cor 1:18 and Luke 14:27 tell us that one is a disciple when one is saved. Therefore, one is saved before baptism in water.

The conclusion is this: The Church of Christ is teaching a false doctrine of salvation. If you are a member, scripture challenges you to "test all things, hold fast to what is good (1Thes. 5:21)." Examine scripture and pray for God's wisdom (James 1:5). Also, the Christian fellowships on campus — Intervarsity Christian Fellowship and Campus Crusade for Christ — will be happy to speak and pray with you.

Why are you calling me?

When four-year-old brother was killed
My mom promised to his cold body
I will bury you on top of the hill
So you can reach heaven easily
So I can visit you every day

But they said there is no space for him
When we stood on the empty space
They said it was reserved
How can you reserve space for someone who is alive?
My brother was Christian, but he was also Japanese

My mother cremated James Akira's body
He was buried in the cemetery away
On the bottom of the hill
Cars passed right by
My mother did not cry

Some people only see my slanted eyes and my black hair
Yes, I have tried to become one hundred percent American
But I am still Asian
Even with my permed hair and thickly eye-lined eyes
I was a China girl, geisha girl, and Madame Butterfly

Racism, what an ugly word I learned
So quickly at such an early age
What or who am I fighting against, I used to ask
It was, and is a battle against myself
I do not want to lose myself, my heritage, or integrity

But how can I not be so bitter
When I cannot be accepted in my own country
When someone I don't know wants to kill me for my slanted eyes
I fear the day when I become anti-white racist
How can we ever end this continuous battle?

I am sure everyone has heard it all
Racism, multiculturalism, diversity and reverse racism
Sometimes I don't want to hear anymore
But everyone, no matter what color, has to pay the price for living in such a catagorized and classified society

Remember Pearl Harbor, people say
Yes, I do, because many people lost their precious lives
I also remember those Chinese who died building the railroads
I remember Martin Luther King Jr., Vincent Chin, Native Americans And others

I remember those who died of injustice

My mother took my brother's ashes back to Japan
Where he will be buried on top of the hill, close to heaven
Her pain-stricken eyes glared at the empty space
Still reserved for seven years for someone
Yes, my brother was Christian, but he was also Japanese

U.S. can't make change in Ireland

This is in response to the anonymous article suggesting U.S. involvement in Northern Ireland [Collegian, Sept. 29].

I spent the last year studying at University College Cork in the Republic of Ireland. Living with Irish people has made me very skeptical of the ability of Americans, even Irish-Americans, to fully understand the problem in the North. Most Americans could care less for one thing, and the ones that do tend to think in terms of a simplistic "Brits out" policy.

Northern Ireland is a very complex political problem. If the British Army left tomorrow, Protestants would still outnumber Catholics two to one. It is very possible that Northern Ireland would revert ot being a "Protestant state for Protestant people." Power-sharing agreements have failed in the past. The Republic of Ireland is a very poor country. Unemployment is already 20 percent, and that's not counting the thousands who emigrate every year. Many people in the Republic ask why would they want the North when they can't even take care of what they've got?

If there is anything we should have learned from our Vietnam experience, it's that we shouldn't rush headlong into this "police" role. A "police" role was not suited to intervention in a bitter civil war in Vietnam. Our "policing" of Latin America has done nothing but create resentment. What has our action in Iraq done to lessen the power of Saddam Hussein?

The author correctly points out that the "U.S. aimed at an outcome that would. . . be beneficial. . ." and not any idealistic goal in its "policing." In none of the above cases has our action been beneficial. Mediation is a better possible U.S. role; still, it is fraught with difficulties. Our government's natural inclination is to let England deal with her "territories" as she sees fit. Iraq was never an "ally," it was a convenience, so it's a false analogy. The U.S. can't be an unbiased mediator.

The "troubles" by now are self-sustaining. The IRA will never kill Ian Paisley because they need him as a source of fundraising. The Protestant paramilitaries would likewise not kill Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams. Who are the bad guys?

The point is that there will never be a solution to the problems in Northern Ireland until the people who live there decide they've had enough. Until then, no amount of conferences between the Republic and England or mediation efforts by the United States will do a damn thing.

Let's give 'em another chance?

While the assumption that "might makes right" is obviously of questionable validity, it is, nonetheless, a powerful notion that is deeply embedded in the American psyche.

There is an implicit assumption in this country that God wouldn't let us kick ass if we weren't right in doing so. So we tend not to question the causes or consequences for military invasions unless they go awry. Witness the Gulf War, where we held Moscow-style welcome home parades for a military that killed over one hundred thousand people — many of them non-combatants. Hyper-patriots were having wargasms over destroying an Iraqi military that the Reagan administration had covertly and illegally built up throughout the 1980s.

This is not a flaw peculiar to our own brand of national chauvinism. Certainly the Old Testament and the Islamic concept of Jihad provide early examples of this phenomenon. Hitler too saw military superiority as evidence of the supremacy of the Aryan race — a good thing to his mind and a lot of Germans who followed him to their graves.

Nonetheless, one hopes that the American people will see through the B-grade movie plot analysis constructed by Media, Inc., and know that Saddam Hussein is not the "New Hitler." The reality is that he is the leader of a second rate imperialist power leading a country that has been pissed off since its inception about not having a viable port outlet to the Persian Gulf (not to mention the whipstocking of its oil by the Kuwaitis).

Will it take another long, bloody conflict to get us to question our domination of Third World peoples for corporate profits? Of so, it will probably mean even more American lives lost than in Vietnam because the government and the elite interests it serves have learned their lessons well.

The government now knows not to send rich white kids to the front lines. Our troops are disproportionately taken from the ranks of poor people of color — "the poverty draft." And since these people don't have power in this society, parents' anguished cries over their children dying won't make a difference (they don't now in the vicious attacks on people of color being prosecuted under the guise of a sham "war on drugs").

Unlike Vietnam, the Pentagon now controls the media, where war footage is pooled and censored by military officials. Bomb shelters become command and control centers, baby formula factories become chemical weapons plants.

For Americans who are concerned with international freedom, equality and self-determination, the upcoming presidential election doesn't mean much. If you think that Clinton-Gore represent some "peace ticket," think again. Clinton's foreign policy hero is Sam Nunn — about as hawkish as they come. Gore has said he thought we shouldn't have dissed the Kurds and should have marched straight to Baghdad. Great thinking, Al: knock off the Bathists so that a fundamentalist Islamic regime that really hates America gets into power while the Kurds go to war with Syria, Kuwait and everywhere else their homeland is a part of.

If you don't think might necessarily makes right, then direct action is the best course of action. To stop the corporate machine, soldiers need to leave the military, third world liberation movements need to be supported, movements for prioritizing domestic social crises must grow.

More fundamentally, the United States must become a truly democratic society, where all of us have equal control over the economic, political and cultural institutions of this country. To paraphrase Al Haig, if the foreign policy of this country was decided by the public, there would be no wars.

ibility and wasn't that specific. Now it may be changed according to their decision," said Wong. "We'll have to look at it carefully."

Wong said he will be obtaining a copy of the ruling and studying it closely to see if it applies to the University directly.

"I'm committed to addressing the gender equality issue," said Wong, who pointed out how confusing the law is. He questioned what the women's field hockey team could be compared to, as well as the football team.

"Hopefully a chain letter effect will kick in and other universities will recognize and implement the [title IX law]" said Kaminski.

that even if that were true it's important to reduce beyond that." Massachusetts enacted the first toxic pollution control law in the nation in 1989.

Greenbaum said that toxic pollution numbers have been dropping since 1990 but mostly due to a reduction in business activity. There have been some breakthroughs, particularly in the high-tech industry where companies are using water-based solvents for cleaning computer chips instead of toxic chlorine-based solvents.

Other sources of toxic pollution in New England are paper companies, printing presses and tile coating firms, chemical companies and manufacturers.

Connecticut was placed high on the list of states reporting toxic water pollution problems. Much of the problem stems from chemicals dumped into the Thames River in Groton, Conn., by Pfizer Specialty Chemicals Group, a pharmaceuticals manufacturer.

The Thames in Groton is a salt water estuary and not a source of public drinking water.

Fall festival on horizon

Annual celebration provides fun for all

By LYNN YAFFEE
Collegian Correspondent

Autumn is here again and so is the 6th Annual Apple Harvest and Crafts Festival that will be taking place Saturday, Oct. 3, at the Amherst Town Common from 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m.

Sponsored by the Amherst Family Center and the Atkins Fruit Bowl, the popular family fair combines crafts, food and lively entertainment for all ages.

With the help of over 200 volunteers, the festival provides many children's activities, including painting pumpkins, decorating cookies, story-telling and games with prizes. Adults can enjoy the assortment of fine crafts and demonstrations created by over 100 craftspeople.

Marie Hartwell-Walker, chairperson of the Festival and President of the Board for the Amherst Family Center, invites families, children and especially students "to turn out for a lovely day and join in all the fun." So as they say... Come one, come all!

Attractions such as homemade chili, apples, fortune tellers and face painting give the festival a real old-time country flair, according to festival organizers.

Another attraction is this year's raffle. Top prizes include a get-away weekend for two at the Swift River Inn in Cummington, an overnight stay for two with breakfast at the Lord Jeffery Inn in Amherst, a chair donated by Danco Scandinavian And Contemporary Furniture in Hatfield and two tickets to a Boston Red Sox game.

Tickets for the raffle only cost $1 or $7 tickets for $5, and they can be purchased at the festival. Raffle tickets are also being sold all week at two local establishments, Charlie's Tavern in Amherst, and Mike's Westview Cafe in North Amherst.

All the proceeds for the fair benefit the Amherst Family Center, located at the North Congregational Church Parish Hall. The goal of the center is to top the $10,000 raised last year at the festival by all of the community support.

In the event of rain, the festival will be held indoors at the Mt. Farms Mall in Hadley.

AT&T Challenge brings Wall Street to UMass

By KIRSTEN ANDELMAN
Collegian Correspondent

Beginning Nov. 2, college students nationwide will have the opportunity to make one of the first eraser marks across the line separating education and actual work experience.

For students studying any facet of the American financial world or possibly just looking for a low-risk, high-excitement experience, AT&T's Collegiate Investment Challenge may be a knock of opportunity worth responding to and definitely worth checking out.

For the price of $49.95, participants are given a fictional $500,00 brokerage account. For the next four months they will be trading real stocks with live "brokers" via toll-free AT&T Service.

Just like the professionals on Wall St. they will earn interest, incur commissions and track stock progress just as they do on the exchanges.

Their calculations to buy, sell or short stocks will be based on real-time quotations of up-to-the-minute stock prices from more than 5,000 actual stocks.

Monthly, they will receive a newsletter called "The Collegiate Exchange," as well as a statement detailing what they've sold, where they rank and how much they're worth. It will also show how their stocks compare to the Dow, within Massachusetts and within UMass.

Aside from the over $200,000 awarded yearly in cash and prizes, what incentive did 80-odd UMass students have to participate last year?

"The way I see it," said Jeff Finger, a senior finance major who ranked 2nd schoolwide last year, "there is the competition component that makes it fun, and the educational component that gives you excellent experience."

The contest gives students the chance to match their stock-picking abilities with 15,000 others nationwide, providing them with the competitive edge that crosses them over into the educational realm that becomes synonymous with experience.

"It was really the best way for me to learn real-life investing inside-out without using real money," Finger said.

Richard Lemppicki, a sophomore science major who finished 5th schoolwide last year said there are many advantages to the program.

"For anyone who plans to do this for a living or just for personal reasons, the program is perfect because it provides them with a rare opportunity to try out different strategies without having anything tangible to lose," Lemppicki said.

And for students experiencing anxiety about entering today's tight job market, having the program behind them definitely puts them a rung above the standard entry-level applicant, according to several professionals.

"Any resume that crosses my desk with the AT&T Collegiate Investment Challenge on it is an automatic read," said Jonathan Steinberg, Editor-in-Chief of Individual Investor.

Students interested in joining the program should call 1-800-545-1975, Ext 12. Any student already involved in the program who in interested in attending strategy workshops should inquire at the School of Management or contact Jeff Finger at 6-2850.

Bail set for UM student

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — A judge has set a bail of $250,000 for a 21-year-old Connecticut man charged with conspiracy in the alleged gang-ordered slaying of a 16-year-old Springfield boy.

Alex Delgado of New Haven was arrested at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst shortly after Arnaldo Esteras was gunned down on a Springfield street Sept. 13.

His lawyer, David Hoose, sought to have bail reduced to $10,000 contending at a hearing Tuesday that a co-defendant, Ismael Cinton, 17, of Springfield, implicated Delgado in an attempt to save himself.

However, Assistant District Attorney Laurel Brandt told Superior Court Judge Constance Sweeney that Delgado was one of two members of the Latin Kings gang, who ordered Esteras killed for making a derogatory remark about a gang member's signature beads.

She said the "termination order" was given after four gang leaders met at the Springfield home of Maria Mercado.

The alleged gunman, Hector Ariaga, 20, of Hartford, Conn., faces arraignment on murder charges Thursday after waiving extradition from Connecticut where he surrendered last week.

Cinton and a 16-year-old, who was not identified because of his age, have also been charged with murder, while four people, including Delgado and Mercado, are accused of conspiracy.

sachusetts. She said she enjoyed the time she spent at the University of Essex in England.

"The University was smaller and more personal — I didn't feel like a number," said Richards.

School of management major Karey Fung spent the summer in Taiwan, learning both the written and spoken language. Tunghai University offers these summer programs which are intensive, with a heavy workload. "The class sizes were really small, three in one class and six in another," said Fung. She said she enjoyed her stay and the people were very friendly.

The program at the University of Nairobi at Kenya is now defunct, but Delene Rankin attended the school last year. She said she had studied abroad before and knew the hardest part was not leaving, but coming home.

"The people were amazingly friendly," said Rankin. "I encourage everyone to visit Africa."

The International Program is more than willing to answer any questions and send students abroad.

There are also many students who have returned from their travels abroad and are willing to discuss their experience.

Both students and program officials warn that students should start planning now if they plan to go abroad.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Do your own research. You need to have all the facts and figures before making an important decision. Increase your income by recycling an idea or project.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Trust your intuition; it is right on target! Outsiders may try to intrude into your inner circle. Stand your ground. A financial problem that once seemed insurmountable can now be solved.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): What seemed so sweet could turn sour. You want to "hold the lorr" at home and work. Whatever comes up, stay calm. Keep higher-ups happy while working behind the scenes to change things.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be alert for hidden tensions at work — a difficult situation could blow at any time. Go quietly about your affairs. Build bridges of friendship with associates.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Go the extra mile to be a star, even if facing highly difficult tasks. Sidestep office gossip; you have important business to conduct. Put any flamboyant plans into the deep freeze for now.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Friendships and partnerships can be filled with deeper understanding today. Confide in one another and act in concert. Joint efforts promise much larger rewards than solo endeavors.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): A bright idea or pet project gets the green light today. Top brass show new appreciation for the work force. You can talk and travel your way to success. Dress your best.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A philosophical disagreement could put you between a rock and hard place with loved one. Get together with those who share your athletic or literary interests.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Stay emotionally centered and you will have little to worry about today. Leave business at the office when you go home this evening. A period of quiet meditation will work wonders.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Rely on those you have worked with a long time. Daydreaming could interfere with your productivity. Focus on the task at hand. Getting better organized will give you free time.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Doing something unusual could lift your spirits and put you on the road to success again. Go after what you want! Romance needs more time to blossom. Save money for a rainy day.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): New romantic heights are within your grasp. Your gift for gab helps you build a relationship. Take stock of your assets and debts.

We should have eaten hereafter. / There would have been time for such a meal, / Tofu and tofu and tofu. / Creeps in this petty food from day to day, / To the last morsel of digestable meat. / And all our burgers have lighted fools / the way to gastric death. / Out out, brief grease fire! / Life is but a walking shadow. / A poor student who struts and frets his final hours upon the line and then is heard no more. / It is a tale told by an undergrad, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing.

WHY YOU SHOULD RECYCLE IN THE RESIDENCE HALLS

RECYCLING SAVES MONEY

-If UMASS residents do not recycle, the Town of Amherst will fine us, which will double our landfilling fee. In 1991, UMASS residents avoided over $100,000 in fines by recycling.

-In 1991, recycling in the Residence Halls also saved the University over $9,000 in actual landfill fees.

Women's sports should certainly be placed at the top of the UMass sports agenda, (see: women's soccer and field hockey) but when the bottom line is revenue, the sad reality is women's sports are a distant second. Watch for UMass to mend some fences in the very near future. It's a must.

Women extend winning streak

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

They weren't around last year, so they didn't experience the pain of the two losses to Northeastern University, but two newcomers helped the University of Massachusetts field hockey team exact revenge on the Huskies in Wednesday's 1-0 victory at Totman Field.

Sweeper Natalie Hart provided steady and solid defense throughout and Ainslee Press played well both ways, stifling the Huskies (5-2) defensively and scoring the game-winning goal on a penalty stroke which lifted the Minutewomen to the victory.

"The thing that the other girls did this week was pass on how regretful they were of last year," Press said. "By the time I stepped on the field today, I hated Northeastern, and I had never even seen them."

The Minutewomen (9-0) extended their winning streak to nine games by outshooting Northeastern 19-18 and shutting the Husky offense down after Press scored on a penalty stroke with 15:47 in the first half. Press was the beneficiary of what UMass head coach Pam Hixon said was a "gutsy call."

"One of our players was about to shoot but a Northeastern player hooked her right in front of their net to set up the penalty stroke."

"It was a good call, the right one to make," Hixon said. "But sometimes in a close game like this the officials won't call it because they don't want to decide a game on a call like that."

When Press set up for the stroke five feet in front of the net, it was almost a near certainty. The team leader in goals with nine, Press used her patented lift shot to elude Northeastern goalie Brenda Mitchell and give UMass the only offense they would need.

Northeastern's last chance to tie things up came in the second half with two and a half minutes left. The Huskies drove in but were turned away when goalie Philippa Scott made a routine kick save from the right side. UMass players frustrated Northeastern in the final moments by stifling the Husky's ball control offense.

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

The UMass field hockey team downed archrival Northeastern 1-0 yesterday. The Minutewomen travel to Old Dominion on Friday where they will meet Virginia.

"We had to play more agressively to stop them than we normally do," Press said. "They had a couple of good opportunities on penalty corners."

"Joy [Blenis] did a super job shadowing Denise Nasca, who I think is one of the best freshman in the country. We put Joy on her for the whole game, and she came through," Hixon said.

Women's soccer keeps heat on

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Kim Eynards scored the game's only goal as the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team beat Dartmouth 1-0, yesterday, to move to 8-0 on the season.

Massachusetts, ranked No. 5 in the nation, played a sluggish game but got a strong performance from goal keeper Skye Eddy who recorded her third shutout of the year.

"We played a little flat today," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "What you saw today was a very vulnerable top five team."

The Minutewomen got the only score they would need in the 71st minute. Freshman forward Nicole Roberts squared the ball to Eynard, who was stationed in the right slot, just inside the goal box. Eynard one-timed it towards the net. Dartmouth keeper Michele Conroy could not control the shot and the ball broke through her arms and slipped between her legs.

"I saw there were no defenders so I just shot," Eynard said. "I new it was a good stroke. It was just shoot and pray. I scored the goal for my new born nephew. I promised my sister yesterday that I'd score for him and I did."

Rudy said, "It was nice to see Kim step up under pressure. I didn't think she'd get it off. It was a difficult ball to one time.

"That is a tough goal for [Dartmouth] to lose on. They played a good game, they were close, he said. "They played a very nice first [half] where we couldn't get in behind them. Their style was able to mess up our attack."

"[Dartmouth] is a good team, but we are just cutting these games too close," Rudy said. "Our intensity was down in practice and it showed today."

The success of this year's team has not come as a surprise to Eynard.

"I guess I did expect us to be undefeated at this point," she said. "We had such a great preseason and we fight for each other. That makes us better. When you play for one another, you play more inspired. It means more."

Rudy said, "8-0 feels great. I think we're capable of winning all our games, if we play to our potential. We didn't do that today. We will have to play better than we did today to remain unbeaten much longer."

Massachusetts travels to Ithaca, N.Y. this weekend for the Cornell Tournament. On Saturday, UMass will face 17th ranked Cornell and on Sunday it will lock horns with the Xavier squad which defeated Dartmouth 4-0.

Minutemen stunned at home by Providence

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

Highly ranked teams are always susceptible to upsets.

The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team, ranked fourth in New England, were shocked yesterday by Providence College at Garber Field, 2-1. The Friars came into Amherst unranked in the latest NE poll, but should crack the top ten with the win.

Coach Sam Koch's Minutemen were touched up for two goals in the second half, and relinquished their halftime lead of 1-0. The winning goal by PC was scored at 65:50 when sophomore forward Matt Baldwin grabbed a pass from Chaka Daley and put it past UMass goalie Eric Gruber.

"We played bad for fifteen minutes (in the second half), and you can't do that against any team. If you let down, you are going to get scored on," said Matt Edgerly, a junior midfielder for UMass.

UMass junior forward Randy Jacobs scored at 39:28 to give the Minutemen a 1-0 lead. Co-captain Shawn Bleau took the throw-in from junior Ted Priestly and dribbled up the sideline.

Bleau looped a pass over two defenders to Jacobs, who drew Friars' goalie Jamie Smith out of the goal and booted it into the net for his fifth goal of the year.

"Today, we had a job to do, and didn't get it done. A lot of games you slip by, but it didn't happen," said junior Justin Edelman.

UMass had 19 shots, but had trouble converting on numerous chances. For PC, Smith had 11 saves and continued his solid play in goal. He has only allowed two goals, including the one by Jacobs, in the last four games.

The star for the Friars was Baldwin, who along with his goal, assisted on his team's other goal.

Providence's first goal came at 59:30 when sophomore forward Steve Warjanka put one past the diving Gruber, tying the game at 1-1. Baldwin leads the Friars in scoring with 11 points (four goals, three assists).

"It's not ability, it's discipline and heart that lost us the game today. I'm not saying that we don't have these things, because we do; but if we're going to get anywhere, we must show it consistently," said Koch.

Saturday is the next chance UMass has to show what it is made of when it hosts Siena, at 2:00 p.m. at Garber Field.

Injury report: Sophomore goalie Mark Wolf, who didn't play because of a hip pointer, is questionable for Saturday's game.

MATT KAHN / COLLEGIAN

The UMass men's soccer team fell to Providence 2-1 yesterday. The Minutemen host Siena on Saturday at 2:00 p.m. UMass is now 5-2-1.

Frank Sinatra

THIS WEEKEND

Old Blue Eyes is coming to town

By Joseph Jourdain-Burns
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Frank Sinatra will sing his heart out in Worcester this Friday night. Yes, I know he's no longer at the peak of his powers as a performer, but he still remains as the greatest vocalist in the history of popular music and a man that still takes his art very seriously.

For members of Generation X, Sinatra remains as relevant as he was in his heyday. As John Rockwell writes in "Sinatra," Sid Vicious' cover of "My Way" was a "not so secret tribute, an attestation of affinities between one of the fathers of punk and who in his music and character became the model of all rockers from the beginning."

The Sinatra of the 50s and 60s was a ground-breaking performer who recorded the first Lp and concept album. With master arranger Nelson Riddle, he created theme albums that perfected the image of a way-out "swinger" or a tormented "saloon singer."

That was due, in part, to the revolutionary way in which Sinatra sings. He was much different than the "belters" that had dominated popular music up until that point. He was one of the first to treat the microphone as a musical instrument. His technique broke ground for other pop stars that would follow such as Perry Como, Dean Martin and Mel Torme. As with big band, rock has its share of "crooners" like Jim Morrisson and Bono.

Sinatra's work ethic as a performer is beyond reproach. During his peak he would release three albums and a couple of movies a year. Yet it is the quality of his 50s work that amazes. In a Playboy interview he described his personal maxim, "The audience is like a broad — if you're indifferent its splitsville."

The essental Sinatra recordings have to be his Capitol boxed set ($35). The set includes the most productive and important years of his career. It masterfully blends older Cole Porter songs and Tin Pan Alley classics with newer, more adult material. Most of the arrangements were done by Riddle, who lends a rich quality to these beautifully remastered CDs. It is by no means an exhaustive collection, but it stands well alone on its own terms.

At Worcester, Sinatra can be expected to attempt material that is better suited for his deeper, more limited voice. It will not be a performance by a young talent. It will be a happening, much like a Grateful Dead show. It's a celebration of the talent of a mature man that is selling out arenas at the age of 76.

Mr. Lupo casts his ballot for Bob Roberts

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

If the Republican National Convention didn't turn your stomach enough and if the "family values" rhetoric hasn't sent you reeling yet, there's enough biting (albeit mostly conservative) political satire in Bob Roberts to keep you plenty apathetic, at least until 1996.

Tim Robbins (The Player) wrote and directed this mockumentary about Bob Roberts, a guitar-wielding, arch-conservative candidate for a Pennsylvania Senatorial seat. He's pitted against an incumbent liberal played by author Gore Vidal. The film is told through the eyes of a documentary team headed by a British journalist. What happens in between Roberts' rise in the polls and election night is engrossing drama, biting comedy and just a little scary, as all of it rings true.

Bob Roberts rises to fame as a "conservative rebel," decrying the sixties as a wasted decade and as a right wing folk singer. He sings songs like "Don't use Drugs" ("Those smoking morons/they're hippie freaks"), "The Times They Are A-Changin' Back" and "Bleeding Hearts" ("What's right is right/what's left is wrong").

Roberts has a wife, Polly, who just smiles and says nothing, a campaign manager (Alan Rickman) who has shady ties to the Iran Contra and S & L scandals and supporters who make Roberts into some sort of conservative demagogue.

Bob Roberts takes brutal swipes at everything right wing. It's no coincidence that every conservative in the film is Evil and every liberal is a saint. This could be considered leftist propaganda if everything in the film seemed fictional. But the events portrayed in Bob Roberts feel way too real.

The film's smaller targets, such as the media, are shown as both decriers of Roberts' double-lined ideas and followers of his squeaky clean (at least on the surface) image.

Bob Roberts works best in its little details. The movie is set during Operation Desert Shield and there's a telling bit where Roberts appears on a Saturday Night Live-type comedy show. Roberts' campaign commercials and slogans like "Pride" lend prickly allusions to their real-life counterparts.

Tim Robbins has the mannerisms, good looks and winning smile that sell our candidates today. He powers the film with his smarmy persona, so well that his egotistical ardor could have easily been transferred to the left, making him a just as effective liberal candidate.

Gore Vidal is the perfect foil for Roberts. He's a little too much of a gleeming, honest liberal to be taken as the "hero" of Bob Roberts, but I must admit, he's great casting. Alan Rickman hits sleazy new levels. However, star cameos from Susan Sarandon, John Cusak, Fred Ward and Helen Hunt, among others, wasn't a good idea. It draws attention away from the film's smart idiosyncracies and relegates the viewer to star-hunting.

If Bob Roberts falters a little near the end, indulges in a leftist moral here and there, it is forgivable. The film teeters on the edge throughout, and I was surprised it didn't happen sooner. This is the kind of movie that validates our frustration with the double-talk and rhetoric while visualizing scathing contempt for the right. The film brazenly crosses the line of simple satire into a

New exhibit illustrates black migration struggle

By YOLANDA Y. BROWN
Collegian Correspondent

On Monday September 28 the Augusta Savage Gallery, located in the New Africa House, hosted the opening reception of the exhibit entitled, "From the South to the North: The Early 20th Century Migration." This exhibit was put up to celebrate the history of the South and also to celebrate the black men on the railroads.

"[I wanted to] know both the differences and the similiarities of the people who left the South and the people who stayed behind."

—Cynthia Packard

The exhibit was put together by two afro-american studies faculty members, Cynthia Packard and Dorrance Hill. "From the South to the North" displays four sculptures by Dorrance Hill and also 50 photographs that were printed and mounted by Cynthia Packard. The photographs and the sculptures illustrate the black migration from the South to the North and the results of that struggle.

Cynthia Packard has been doing research in Buckingham, Virginia for the past 4 years in order to put this exhibit together. She went through church records, court records, tax records, and any other records she could find to get information on these photographs.

Packard conducted oral history interviews and talked with the people whose ancestors actually came from Buckingham, Virginia.

"I learned about history on a personal basis and got history from people who were the history," says Packard. "[I wanted to] know both the differences and similarities of the people who left the South and the people who stayed behind."

Dorrance Hill who has been doing sculptures for the past 10-15 years explained that his sculptures represented more of a combination of the North and the South. He said that he used mainly scraps of metal and any other "junk" that he could find to make his sculptures with.

"Blacks in the South had to make do with what they had and that's what I did," explains Hill.

Cynthia Packard and Dorrance Hill's exhibit of "From the South to the North" will remain on display through October 23. I encourage all students who haven't already, to go look at the exhibit because it portrays a lot of realistic photographs and sculptures of the South in a time period that is very rarely discussed.

Ugly Kid Joe's new CD lives up to their name

By LAUREN FOBERT
Collegian Correspondent

America's Least Wanted
Ugly Kid Joe
Stardog/Mercury

COURTESY MICHAEL LEVINE

Ugly Kid Joe

At this point I think most people know who the group Ugly Kid Joe is. For those of you who don't, does the song "(I Hate) Everything About You" ring a bell? Ah, yes, it's all coming back to you now. Well, it was my task to review their latest CD America's Least Wanted. What a catchy title.

Now I know one shouldn't judge a CD by its title but I was already getting a feeling of what the music was going to be like; shallow tunes with a "why-be-normal?" attitude. Needless to say, Ugly Kid Joe did not let me down and for fear of really insulting them, I'd say they're Poison, beefed up and in a bad mood.

For the most part, their songs are completely forgettable. There are a couple of exceptions, however, and it's these songs that make their CD so much more than just a really expensive frisbee.

There's the mellow and 60s-like "Mr. Recordman," a song that doesn't seem like it belongs on this album, but nonetheless, a welcome addition. It's a thoughtful tune about—now hold on to your hats—a band trying to make it in the heartless and cut-throat music biz. Just soak in these stirring lyrics: "Mr. Recordman, do you know who I am?/Mr. Recordman, do you really think I can?/I've takin' a likin' to your game/I think we all feel the same/Is it a dream or is it real/You say you want to cut a deal?"

Wow. Shakespeare couldn't have said it better.

There's also the surprising inclusion of the Harry Chapin classic "Cat's in the Cradle." This song really seems misplaced on this CD, but listening to it helps ease the headache you'll get from the other songs. And who could forget the song they're known for, "Everything About You." This, I must admit, is a great song.

For the sole reason that it's so negative and funny at the same time.

Who couldn't help but love singing to lyrics like "I get sick when I'm around, I can't stand to be around, I hate everything about you!" Perfect music to heal a rotten mood. The icing on the cake is Pat, the androgynous character from Saturday Night Live, opening the song and groaning, "Are you the guys on the beach who hate everything?" (An obvious reference to their video.) The group seems to have an affection for Pat since she's...he's...er, Pat's featured in their new video of the song "Neighbor."

Ugly Kid Joe is trying desperately to be offbeat, gross and immature and I think they've perfected it. The cover photo is a cartoon of the Statue of Liberty flipping the bird. The inside cover is a picture of the band showing the world fast food, after it's been chewed by their preciously talented mouths. Yum.

And dare I forget to mention the special thanks section where they thank, and I quote, "...everyone who survived the Zit Poppin', Butt-Pickin', Booger-flingin' Across America Tour 91-92!" Double yum. They present themselves to be the equivalent of those kids in high school who used to put "Kick me" signs on people's backs: sick but funny.

Ugly Kid Joe's music sounds like all the other fluff out there on the radio waves nowadays, but it's fluff you can stomach and heck, maybe even sing along to if, say, you have PMS or your girlfriend dumped you.

So, if you like to bite your toenails and chew your food with your mouth open, I'd say go for it, pick up Ugly Kid Joe's new CD and set your nasty habits to music. If that fails, you can always play frisbee.

Great rock 'n roll is in their blood

By LISA CURTIS

COURTESY MARC SEROTA

Bloodline

The apples don't fall far from the tree, but when you're father is an incredibly talented, famous musician, that's not such a tough cross to bear. Most of the members of Bloodline have this in common. Erin (son of the late jazz trumpet player Miles Davis) on drums, Waylon (son of The Doors guitarist Robbie Krieger) on guitar/vocals, Berry Oakley, Jr. (son of the late bassist for the Allman Brothers Band) on bass/lead vocal, and finally Aaron (son of Sammy Hagar of Van Halen.)

If that isn't enough, the nucleus of the band is a critically acclaimed guitar virtuoso, aged 15, named Smokin' Joe Bonamassa who has played with or opened for B.B. King, John Lee Hooker, Charlie Daniels, Danny Gatton, Robert Cray, Buddy Guy, Little Feat and Blues Traveler.

Rounding out this band whose members range in age from 15 to 22 is keyboardist Lou Segreti, 30, whose duties include acting as musical director for the band, supervising the arrangements of the songs, and keeping the band true-to-form.

It is the round-faced Bonamassa, already critically acclaimed on his own, who was headlining his own band before being signed with Premiere Artists Services (who also promote aged Liza Minelli and Frank Sinatra) and who has been playing guitar since he was 4 and clubs since he was 9 that was the centerpiece around whom all the other band members were recruited.

"[Bonamassa] steals the show casually chewing gum during impressive guitar solos the way Keith Richards smokes cigarettes, posturing like an old hand at the electric blues," writes Steve Garbarino in New York Newsday.

Their producer is the legendary Phil Ramone who has worked with Paul Simon and Billy Joel.

Bloodline has a blues based "classic rock" sound. They've been described by Guitar magazine as "kind of a mix between the Allman Brothers and the Doors." But, Bloodline is very much their own band playing original material with occasional covers from their famous heritage.

Bloodline will perform a free show Friday night at Pearl Street in Northampton.

Buffalo Tom returns to UMass stomping grounds

By ROLAND COGGIN
Collegian Staff

Friday night will be a sort of homecoming for Buffalo Tom as they play the Student Union Ballroom. Though they are known to everyone else as a Boston band, they formed in 1986 while attending UMass, Amherst. Like Dinosaur Jr. and the Pixies, we'll proudly claim them as our own.

Buffalo Tom is a band that has progressed from popularity in Boston to national college radio airplay and their latest album, Let Me Come Over (Beggars Banquet/RCA) has found a place on alternative charts nationwide. A group of musicians more passionate than Bill Janovitz, Tom Maginnis and Chris Colbourn would be hard to find; so much emotion comes through the noisy guitars and unpolished production of their albums that they couldn't be ignored.

Comparisons to Dinosaur Jr. are frequent (J. Mascis helped produce their first two albums), but Buffalo Tom has found a style beautifully raw and quite their own.

Buffalo Tom songs are well-written and no matter how noisy, are melodic enough to be accessible. As the cliche goes, they are a band that will "grow on you," and their live performances have gone over extremely well in Boston.

Joining Buffalo Tom is another Boston band, Come, who are getting attention before their first album has even been released. The latest Spin magazine calls them "on the brink of the big time."

Opening band Coffee rounds out the lineup of another UPC show that shouldn't be missed. Go welcome Buffalo Tom "home" and see what some UMass kids do out in the real world and decide for yourself if Come is the next big thing in independent music.

Buffalo Tom, with bands Come and Coffee play Friday at the Student Union Ballroom. Tickets $5 UM/ID.

Perot plunges back into November race

By TOM RAUM
Associated Press

DALLAS — Ross Perot plunged belatedly into the presidential race on Thursday, setting the stage for a three-way struggle with President Bush and Bill Clinton over the final month of the campaign.

"Government is a mess," Perot said. The Texas Billionaire said he was joining the race because "neither political party has effectively addressed" economic and other concerns that are on the minds of the voters. "We gave them a chance; they didn't do it," he said of his rivals.

He made his remarks at a news conference 11 weeks to the day after he announced he would not run. He said at the time he believed he could not win and did not want to be a disruptive influence on the campaign.

He didn't address the likelihood of victory in his announcement speech before family, friends and supporters in his home state of Texas. Instead, he looked beyond the election, pledging to dedicate himself to solving the nation's problems and rallying the public to the cause.

"Looking forward, working together, we can fix anything," he said.

Perot once had support rivaling that of Bush and Clinton in the public opinion polls. His backing dwindled through a series of spring controversies and he now runs a distant third in polls.

His entry has the effect of injecting uncertainty to a race that Clinton has led consistently since July.

Perot cast his announcement as a deferential bow to the volunteers he said had urged him to reconsider his earlier refusal to run. However, spending reports he filed with the government indicate he has spent millions since his nominal withdrawal to maintain a political infrastructure and make sure his name was placed on all 50

Express Your Rage rally unites women, teaches self defense

By STACY MALONE
Collegian Staff

The crowd thrusted their fists in the air, stomped their feet and kicked their legs at their imaginary abusers as they shouted "fight back" in unison.

The "Express Your Rage" rally, sponsored by Necessities/Necesidades, on the steps of the Unitarian Church in Northampton last night, brought many women out to tell their stories of domestic violence.

"The number of women who killed their abusers is declining," said Gail Kielson, a speaker at the rally, "Women are buying cemetery plots instead of weapons to defend themselves and are given an average of 10 to 15 years in jail for choosing jail over a cemetery."

Kielson said, women are clearly under seige with their body counts rising. The domestic violence speaker stated, "We can no longer allow them to silence us. We must raise our fighting spirits. We are fighting mad." She said women will no longer tolerate the violation of their bodies, souls, spirits, and rights. She spoke through the crowd, "We must fight and we must fight now."

"The system does little to enforce restraining orders until the victim is beaten severely or dead," said Priscilla King, a speaker at the "Express Your Rage" rally and a battered woman. Her experiences of domestic violence led to 14 restraining orders against her abuser. Due to a plea bargain, the abuser only served a one year sentance for raping King's daughter five times.

King said, domestic violence is a crime of silence because victims are afraid and ashamed to speak out. She said there need to be stronger laws to protect women, because "restraining orders cannot stop bullets."

Beaten for six years by a man who said he loved her, "Suzie," a victim of domestic violence, spoke over the open microphone. She asked the crowd of silent people to imagine wondering "if the person who says they love you will come home and say they love you, rape you or kill you."

"Suzie" said her abuser was finally sent to jail for attempting to kill her. He received a nine month sentence, but that was increased to a year after she received several letters from him, while he was in jail, threatening her life.

Sixteen years of sexual abuse, the assault of her six siblings and the battering of her mother into four miscarriages, caused "Kate" to leave home as a teenager.

"Kate's" abuser was her father, a Metropolitan police officer. She said, for 22 years the police and the community protected her father while he abused her whole family and "he is still living there comfortably, remarried with grandchildren."

The stories of domestic violence continued as woman after woman walked up to the microphone and told their stories of abuse. The women supported one another in their applause, shouts of support, and shoulders to cry on.

"We will do some fighting back. We have to fight back," said Sandy Goodman from the Valley Women's Martial Arts, Inc. She gave women tips on how they can protect themselves. The women would chant "fight back" as they practiced their moves of defense.

Judge throws out bankers plea

Branch manager charged in Gulf War loan scheme

By MARK RICE
Associated Press

ATLANTA — A judge threw out a plea agreement Thursday and cleared the way for a trial for a former bank manager on charges of masterminding a scheme to loan Iraq $5.5 billion during its pre-Gulf War military buildup.

A lengthy trial is now expected in the case, which has raised questions about whether the Bush administraion covered up its role in arming Saddam Hussein before the war.

Christopher Drogoul, former Atlanta branch manager for Italy's government-owned Banca Nazionale del Lavoro, will be tried on 347 counts of bank fraud. He pleaded guilty in June to 60 counts, but later tried to withdraw the plea, saying he was make a scapegoat by top BNL officials.

Drogoul, 43, could have been sentenced to life in prison, fined $17.5 million and ordered to pay $1.8 billion in restitution for the 60 counts.

At a sentencing hearing Thursday, prosecutors reversed themselves and asked U.S. District Court Judge Marvin Shoob to throw out the plea bargain. Shoob agreed.

"Drogoul cannot have it both ways," said acting U.S. Attorney Gerrilyn Brill. "He can't plead guilty, ask the court for leniency and project a public image of innocence. There is no middle ground."

The case's change in direction came a day after Drogoul's attorney, Bobby Lee Cook, presented a mysterious document countering the prosecution's contention that Drogoul alone masterminded the loan scheme.

Cook presented a document purportedly showing BNL officials had sought assurances through an intermediary from then - U.S. Attorney General Dick Thornburgh that the bank would not be implicated. Cook said the document was a BNL executive summary, written in Italian, that was slipped under his hotel room door Tuesday night.

Thornburgh, who announced the indictment against Drogonul in 19991, has said he doesn't remember discussing the case with the intermediary.

End of Cold War means job loss for many

By JOHN DIAMOND
Associated Press

WASHINGTON— Congress and the pentagon appear far from a consensus after a day of testimony Thursday on what to do about the thousands of soldiers and defense workers who will lose their jobs with the end of the Cold War.

A hearing of the Defense Department's Defense Conversion Commission generated statements of concern and sympathy from lawmakers and commission members. But as the congressional session wound toward a close, there appeared no set of proposals with support that address the problem.

The commission is due to report its findings from a series of hearings around the country by year's end by which time a new administration could be preparing to move into the White House. Congress included some measures designed to address military shrinking pains in its budget worked out Thursday by House and Senate negotiators.

Beyond that, the opinions of witnesses varied.

The hearing was weighted with representatives from New England, a region particularly vulnerable to cuts in Pentagon weapons programs.

Rep. Sam Gejdenson, D-Conn., cited a recent study that predicted that Connecticut would be the hardest hit state in the nation by the defense spending cuts predicted between now and 1997.

The study, conducted by the Washington based Defense Budget Project research group, said Pentagon cuts would eliminate 2.3 of the state's jobs.

Most of the witnesses spoke in favor of some sort of financial aid for the victims of defense cutbacks. Indeed, the defense budget agreed upon by House and Senate negotiators Thursday contains about $1.5 billion for programs to help defense industries and workers.

But several lawmakers raised concerns about how that money is spent.

"What is a defense worker?" said Sen. John Chafee, R-R.I. "Surely it's the person at the submarine shipyard. But what about the supplier for the shipyard? And what about the fellow working at the lunch counter that depends on those shipyard workers for business?"

Rep. Dean Gallo, R-N.J., chairman of the Northeast Midwest Congressional Coalition, said that the worker assistance programs, although well-intentioned, "are not established, and will take at least a year to be implemented."

UN to guard Somalian convoys

By Martin Finucane
Associated Press

BOSTON — The New York—based private relief agency CARE wants United Nations forces to protect food convoys to the people of Somalia even after the supplies leave the port city of Mogadishu.

Protecting the convoys inside the city is "in essence, very little help. What we need is for the convoy to be protected all the way to the final point of distribution," CARE President Philip Johnston said Thursday.

Somalia plunged into chaos and clan warfare following the ouster of dictator Mohamed Siad Barre in January 1991. The bloodshed continues despite the internatinol effort to feed millions of Somalis who are at risk of starving to death because of the warfare and drought.

Five hundred U.N. soldiers have been committed by Pakistan to protect the port and airport where relief supplies arrive. Delivery of aid has been hampered by warfare and looting.

But Johnston said Thursday the Pakistanis would be restricted to protecting food shipments within the city and that was "unacceptable to CARE."

CARE has been running the port, but plans to turn responsibility for it over to the United Nations forces.

The goal is to increase the amount of food brought through the port from 10,000 to 12,000 tons per month to 50,000 to 60,000 tons per month, Johnston said.

Johnston said he wasn't concerned by a U.N. official's reported statements that uncoordinated food shipments were clogging the port.

"I would discount that tremendously because clogging the port isn't happening. There are days and days when there's no ship in the harbor whatsoever," he said.

He acknowledged concerns about looting, however, and that CARE had discouraged one ship from unloading because of concerns about looting.

Johnston said the ship was carrying food wrapped for individual families and CARE considered those "theft-friendly."

Peace Corps volunteers increasing in number

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

Imagine dedicating over two years of your life in the Peace Corps to living and working in one of the 90 developing nations worldwide, learning a language and developing new skills.

Michael Wood, a Peace Corps public affairs specialist, said in the 90's many more people have considered volunteering for the Peace Corps. "The grass-roots international development agency is enjoying a 15% increase in applications so far in 1992," he said.

Celeste Landon, a University of Massachusetts Peace Corps recruiter, said the increased interest in volunteering can be attributed to the fact that people are recognizing the valuable job experience the Peace Corps offers.

"Peace Corps gives the volunteer the opportunity to be creative and work from their own initiative while at the same time developing pertinent career skills," she said.

While in the Peace Corps, Landon said she worked with parents in the Dominican Republic, teachers and cooks, helping them come up with more flavorful recipes for the children to eat. Landon also worked for the sanitation department building latrines.

"It was lonely at times because I missed the support I had from my family, but my friends and I managed to develope a strong support system among ourselves, said Landon.

Wood said the number of volunteers is on the rise because people are moving away from the "me" attitude of the 80's and into the 90's spirit of giving.

"I've had people come to me and say they have a need and desire to volunteer for the Peace Corps because they have been so fortunate and have had someone taking care of everything for them all their lives," he said.

According to the results of a 1990 study by the Gallup Organization, volunteering in the U.S. is at its highest level ever with approximately 98 million Americans sharing personal resources and volunteering an average of four hours per week in 1989.

Wood said these figures represent a 23% overall increase in the level of volunteering since 1987.

According to Wood, volunteering for the Peace Corps is an opportunity of a lifetime. "There is nothing more exciting than waking up knowing you are a part of a foreign country's culture and not just a tourist."

Wood volunteered in Liberia as an English and science teacher. "I had great relationships with students and other teachers and I was able to develop presentation skills which were beneficial to my career," he said.

Wood said Peace Corps volunteers enjoy benefits like paid travel and living expenses, free medical and dental care, graduate education opportunities and financial aid, along with a $5,400 end-of-service bonus.

For more information about the Peace Corps application process and which overseas opportunities are available, call the UMass Peace Corps office at 545-2105, 12 Draper Hall.

Unfunded program seeks reinstatement

By KRISTIN J. ST. JOHN
Collegian Correspondent

Last night at the New Africa House a group of about 30 students and faculty discussed possible actions that could be taken to help bring awareness to the University and residing communities to the recent loss of funding to the Upward Bound Program.

In retaliation to the program being cut, a petition is being passed around demanding the University to reinstate and fund the program until 1995 when another federal proposal can be written.

There have also been letters sent to University officials and politicians in connection with the Upward Bound Program

Other issues discussed were the administrations meetings and efforts towards development of a new program headed by Journalism professor, Nicholas McBride.

Also, the possibilties of having fundraisers to help the efforts of the group to campaign against the University was proposed.

"We want to get the program back, somehow," said an anonymous supporter.

Soviets seek out American business' help

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

Five Russian delegates on a two week Massachusetts tour to examine American government, education and economy, met yesterday at Hills North to speak with the press.

"Your businesses and your universities from a social perspective is very important to us. A big part of our economy is the military. But now we don't need such a huge military. That is why you can see the military under conversion. The industry is starting to produce goods for peaceful purposes," said Vladislav Toumanov, head of Pskov's regional administration. Pskov is an old Russian town located near Leningrad.

The officials are hoping to attract American businesses to Russia, in addition to having an increase in the amount of Russian goods sold in the United States. Through exchanging ideas with the two countries, the delegates want to see a stronger bond between the two countries.

"We have great feelings about American businessmen in Russia," said Alexandre Fedotov, Management Training Center's director at St. Petersburg, Russia.

One of the exchanges being planned, is with a dry food company, CBLM Associates in Granby according to Boris Polozov, head of Pskov's regional development and redevelopment authority. Another is with The Yankee Candle Company in South Deerfield. The Russians hope to set up a situation, where they can accompany the Americans in making the products.

Yet the exchanges will not only include businesses, but also students. The University is planing to enroll Russian exchange students next fall.

"The system of education is now under reconstruction. I've seen the positive influence of the U.S. [educational] system in Russia," said Alexandr Zadontsev, a specialist in the Russian educational system.

Alexander Prokofiev, head of the Pskov City Administration sees the government changing its tax policy. Less state owned enterprises are being taxed. Now more money comes from private companies.

Dangerous curves up ahead

Cyclists urged not to use incomplete bicycle trail

By JOHN WINCHELL
Collegian Correspondent

For years, local bicyclists have asked the proverbial question: "Why doesn't someone build a public bike trail between Amherst and Northampton?"

The query was finally resolved when the Five-College consortium joined forces with Northampton and Amherst and started construction of a paved bike path.

The path extends 8.6 miles from Damon Road in Northampton to Station Road in Amherst.

Palmer Paving Corp., of Ludlow, has been building the project and expects to finish by May 28, 1993, Ken Neary, the residential project engineer at the Northampton Department of Environmental Management, said the facility will cost almost 2.2 million dollars.

But months before its anticipated opening next May, conflicts have arisen from bicyclists and pedestrians vying for elbow room on the completed portion of the bike trail.

Neary strongly discourages the public from using the path until its finished.

At this point, Neary says, "We consider the bike path a construction site and not a recreational facility." Construction is about 50 percent complete, he said.

Both the town and the construction company have posted signs warning against premature use of the path until completion. In fact, the Departmental of Environmental Management says using the path now could be hazardous.

"It will be hard to ever fully enjoy the path if we lose someone before it's ever built," said spokeswoman Rachel Moore.

Both state and town officials were alerted to the problem by numerous calls from concerned drivers who had close calls with oncoming bicyclists in several sections of the path where it merges with major roads such as Route 9 in Hadley.

Two culverts will be built — one under Route 9 in Hadley and another under Route 116 in Amherst, near Amherst College. The plan also calls for bike parking lots to be built at both ends of the bike path.

Both the Northampton and the state DEM are asking for public cooperation to refrain from using the path until its spring completion.

Tom Boldway, a local cyclist and merchandiser at Bike World Too in Amherst, has tried out the path and believes it's possible although it has a few dangerous sections.

"Some bridges (over roads) are unfinished," he said. "The unfinished sections are being built using railroad ties."

"At times of restricted sight, especially at night, one could fall through," Boldway said. But he applauded the DEM for alerting the public of potential hazards.

"It's smart to warn people of the path being under partial construction," he said. He believes it is the "cyclist's responsibility" to watch for motorists when the path merges with Route 9 and other major roads.

"The responsibility is up to the individual," he said.

The path uses a train bridge to skirt the Connecticut River. "The views when riding the train bridge are quite scenic," he said.

If all goes as planned, after May 28, everyone will be able to share this natural beauty.

U.S. Department of Education had supplied $241,000 to the $326,000 budget until last year when a grant that was written in 1982 was used again and the funding taken away.

The purpose for the program was to assist first generation and/or low income college bound high school students. The program would assist them through all four years in college and included financial aid advocacy, tutoring, counseling, and college-preparatory classes.

Women are left on very thin ice

Why is it facilities for women have been slashed by budget cuts while men's remain practically unscathed?

The Everywoman's Center has lost 26 percent of its budget over the past three years and its services for women are slowly disappearing. On the opposite side of campus, a brand-spankin' new sports arena is being built. Does anyone else see something wrong with that?

Stacy
MALONE

The state and the University are pulling financial support out from underneath the feet of the women's community, while the men glide along by us on freshly layered ice. Outside funding was found pretty easily for a sports facility (surprise!), but not for a women's center (overwhelming surprise!). Oh, did I mention after a few phone calls I discovered there is a nice layer of public funding under the sports arena's foundation? Well, there is. Isn't it nice that public and private money are in favor of a kinder and gentler place to play sports, rather than supporting women's programs?

I am not saying women are not going to use the sports facility (I'd like to see them stop us) and the facility will be a benefit to the women's sports teams. After the elimination of three of the women's varsity sports teams and only one of the men's teams, I feel they at the very least deserve to use the facility which probably was paid for at their expense. I am saying women need more programs and facilities. Public money should give priority to programs which will have a positive effect on the community. Most programs supporting the assistance and well-being of women are in need of money much more than additional sports facilities.

The Everywoman's Center offers so many important programs which assist in the enrichment of the women's community. These programs for women are not ones that should be lost for lack of money. It is ridiculous that the Everywoman's Center has had to lose five of their direct programs. These programs are necessary and women should have the right to have these resources available. When the Everywoman's Center is financially slashed it is felt by the women's community. Women need a place to find support for the discrimination we face; the Everywoman's Center provides this.

Women are in need of counseling as survivors of rape, incest, sexual harassment, sexual assault and abuse, and to deal with the discrimination and daily pressures of being women in a male dominant society. Where will we go if the Everywoman's Center loses any more programs from budget cuts? Women need additional support groups, more workshops and more staff to help with the increasing numbers of women seeking counseling. Where will we go if the Everywoman's Center loses more programs due to lack of financial support from the public, the state and the University? Eventually will the only therapy available be ice hockey in a shiny new sports arena?

Women stand on very thin ice in our society as it is. It is disgusting that men so easily skate by us in many different aspects of life — could it be that the men can afford the skates?

Perot and the Greg Brady effect

In the course of a few short months, H. Ross Perot went from savior to charlatan.

Perot, the man with the golden everything, came into the 1992 presidential race as a maverick who was about to stir things up.

What was supposed to be a boring race between George (Dr. Domestic Doolittle) Bush and Slick Willie Clinton heated up immediately with the arrival of a third party candidate in the guise of Perot.

Michael
MORRISSEY

Perot started off right, throwing equal amounts of blame at both Clinton and Bush for skirting the major issues. He was able to gain many supporters who felt that modern-day politics had grown too big or too corrupt, and he vowed to change the country. In his own words, Mr. Pee-row (not to be confused with hero) was planning to "buy the election for the American people." Instead, he wouldn't even buy his own commercials. He wouldn't listen to his top aides, men like Ed Rollins who helped Ronald Reagan win the presidency. Pee-row alienated thousands of workers and millions of followers with something as basic as his personality.

That's right, his personality. When you grow up to be a billionaire, one of the positives is that you do not have to listen to anything you do not want to hear, and you do not have to do anything you do not feel like doing.

One of the negatives of being richer than Croeseus is that you generally start believing your own hype. I cannot speak personally on the subject, but Mr. Pee-row seems to get excited by seeing his name in the newspapers, which may be one of he reasons he came back into the race.

So Pee-row went from being a potential president, or at least enough of a diversion to throw the election into the House of Representatives, to a insincere baby who wouldn't do what it would take to win. When Rollins resigned, citing a personality conflict with Pee-row, it was the end. While the petition drive to put him on the ballot was going strong, little cracks were showing in his campaign.

Men like Pee-row walk with an aura that they know what is best for the American people. They distance themselves from politicians and call themselves "outsiders," when in reality they've received millions of dollars in contracts and tax breaks from Washington. Men who make money must know what is best for us, right?

Unlike politicians, some of whom have degrees in law, and (theoretically) ethics, billionaires are only ethical to the extent that it will earn them another buck.

Pee-row hired private investigators to check campaign volunteers, according to The New York Times. How warped is that? People who want to contribute because of their belief in the democratic institution are followed because Pee-row is paranoid that someone is out to get him.

No one is out to get him, because no one can even touch him. Pee-row is the ultimate slippery eel, sliding here and there, always just avoiding the spotlight of questions and allegations that the media were about to throw.

It was a great strategy for someone who has as much ability for president as myself, because he dropped out for the middle of the campaign. He was easily forgotten as an eccentric millionaire who broke a lot of promises and crushed many dreams.

But he waited a little too long and wavered a bit too much. Trying to get his name in the headlines by saying maybe he would come back only hurt his cause. The media portrayed him as a man unable to make up his mind, which essentially he is.

So, the big question at Thursday's press conference wasn't "Will he or won't he?", it was "How big of a moron does he think we are?" Pee-row thinks he's helping the election process, but by alienating millions of people who saw through his charade, he ended up destroying it.

Incredibly, there are still people who will vote for the man, and one friend used this analogy: "Hey, at first Greg Brady didn't want the attic for his room in 'The Brady Bunch,' so he gave it to Marcia. Then he decided he wanted it after all so he took it."

If Greg Brady does it, it must be okay. Oh country, I mourn thee.

Gay community must stand united

Only six states in the country insure the basic civil rights of gay men, lesbians, and bisexuals. Only twelve towns or cities have domestic partnership legislation. Thirty percent of all teenage suicides are attempted by gay and lesbian youths.

We as lesbian, gay, transgender, bisexual and heterosexual allies need to unify to fight the common enemies of oppression and homophobia.

Jason
MCDONALD

Too often our communities are wracked by internal disputes leaving many of the issues pertinent to our very survival unattended. And while our community is diverse, as GLBTGSA people come from all backgrounds, classes, races, abilities, and religions, there are some common issues we can work with together.

Ensuring legislation to guarantee our basic civil rights in such areas as housing, employment and public accomodation is a first step. Domestic partnership legislation giving us the same rights and abilities afforded heterosexual couples is another.

On a governmental level, we must work to bring to an end the military's ban on the enrollment of bisexual/homosexual peoples.

And for our very survival, we must address the frightening number of GLBTG suicides that take place every year, as well as bring an end to the ever increasing number of queer-bashings taking place across the country.

For many GLBTG people the fundamental issue of coming out is still their prime concern. We must continue to fight to bring to an end all forms of homophobia and oppression, in the hope of making a more compassionate, tolerant world where people are accepted for who they are, not what people want them to be.

Our diversity can be the tool of understanding, by which we can understand the hardships of others.

We as GLBTGSA people have had to overcome many personal and political hardships throughout our lives. We cannot allow our communities to become separated by being more concerned with ideological rhetoric than actual accomplishment.

While arguments over whether we are gay, homosexual or queer may seem of dire importance in academia, we must still realize that it is a privilege to have this ability to theorize. Whether we are born or bred is not the real issue. The fact that we are, and do exist is a reality.

As people are still being bashed and murdered on the streets and in their homes, we must unite in our struggle. The war against homophobia is not over. We cannot allow personal differences to interfere in our ability to work together in making a more compassionate, tolerant world.

I know how tiring the struggle is; many of us burn out in the process. We must believe that we can make a difference. If one less person commits suicide, or one less person is bashed, then the fight is almost over.

Brothers' games disrupt dorm

I live in a low-rise in Southwest. I, like most of the people on my floor, have early classes and go to bed relatively early. Last Wednesday night we got a little surprise.

I had begun to sleep when I was awoken by a group of guys outside yelling at 12:30 a.m. I thought, "Okay, this is Southwest and they'll probably stop in a minute." Wrong! The group came into the building and began to go from floor to floor screaming. Finally they came to the my floor. I got up and saw about 20 guys from Delta Upsilon fraternity knock on a door down the hall, force their way in and start to cheer. They had the right room of one of their maybe pledges, but his roommate, a sophomore from the football team, was rightfully upset when awoken.

When the football player tried to make the guys leave it almost ended in a fight. Why did the frat guys get upset when told to leave a room where they woke two people at 12:30 a.m.? I'll tell you why: immaturity. The frat guys think the world revolves around them and showed no consideration for the residents. A representative of the fraternity, holding an open beer, said they were going to pledges, waking them and making them drink a beer.

I hope action will be taken by the University or Greek Council to prevent things like this from happening in the future.

I am not trying to put down all frats by the actions of this one. I have met many Greeks and individually most seem nice, but when you get a group of brothers their maturity level drops — especially when alcohol is involved. The freshman should hear the whole story about Greek life. It's just not Excellence, Friendships and Brotherhood. Freshmen should use the whole semester or year to find out which fraternity to join, if any. Make sure these people are your friends and just don't want your dues.

Recycling makes more cents

Whenever I go to throw something away (unnecessary packaging) I jump back in horror as I always see cans lying on top of the other contents of the barrel. Cans! Can you believe it? In today's economy, people throwing away money? Perhaps it is impractical to carry around a can for a measly nickel, but one might argue that it is also impractical to throw away your futur. I haven't even mentioned the other paper and plastic I see in the garbage cans that should be recycled. What do you think happens to all that?

You pay for trash receptacles to collect it, people to empty them and pick up around them and for somebody to bury it in their landfill for you. I hope you enjoy the rising tuition rates because you're helping to raise them! If you could regard carrying garbage to the recycling container instead of the nearest trash receptacle as cool then maybe we wouldn't need so many barrels, collectors and landfills. It might increase our output so much that we could sell it to the rapidly expanding recycling industry and make money. If we built our own recycling plant we could turn a profit while adding to our engineering curriculum and put those laid off trash collectors to work. Perhaps it would be possible to have responsible people facilitate this process by improving systems within the rooms with more receptacles, properly labeled, perhaps derived from a fraction of the boxes I see being disposed of daily. So come on people. Give a hoot, don't pollute!

UMass builds a new railroad

Lining Bar Gang recreates past with work songs

By QUESIYAH ALI
Collegian Correspondent

While books and museum exhibits afford us the opportunity to read and observe historical events, live performance artists the Lining Bar Gang provide a unique, multisensory approach to learning history.

The 30 member troupe from Buckingham County, Virginia, present an oft-forgotten part of American history — the railroad construction era — from the perspectives of the Black crews who helped to build the tracks, recreating their work experiences through traditional Call-and-Response songs. They will perform on a temporarily installed railroad track behind the New Africa House.

"The performance," said Cynthia Packard, lecturer in the W.E.B. DuBois Department of Afro-American Studies, "is a historical re-enactment of the work Black laborers did on the railroad before mechanization. Everything was done by hand".

Packard extended the invitation to the Lining Bar Gang to perform at the University after meeting the manager of the troupe, Charles White, while conducting research in Virginia. She was struck by the music's unusual nature.

"The Call-and-Response work song," explains Packard, "combined with the percussion produced by hammering down the lining bars and moving the rails created a unique musical form."

"The Call- and- Response work song...created a unique musical form"

Cynthia Packard

The Lining Bar Gang has performed throughout the South, including the prestigious Valentine Museum in Richmond, Virginia. They are performing in cooperation with the Massachusetts Foundation for the Humanities, the W.E.B. DuBois Department of Afro-American Studies, the Amherst Railway Society and a host of other University organizations.

This blend of African Americana and musical history is an experience not to be overlooked. We'll see you at the railroad!

Traditional song, dance in FAC

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

Even in the height of our cultural awareness, few things can teach us as much about the customs and lifestyles of other people as can art. This realization came to me not after years of studying art and history, but from sitting for about two hours in row N at the Fine Arts Center Wednesday night.

The 21 member American Indian Dance Theater mesmerized the audience as they performed their Eastern Woodlands Suite, a program comprised of traditional chants, songs, and dances. The ceremonial pieces paid homage to ancestors, celebrated various animals, and exhibited tribes' beliefs concerning power, wisdom, and harmony in nature.

The opening piece transformed the audience and carried us back centuries ago, to a land of open plains and natural beauty. The peaceful chirping of crickets, slow methodical drums and low, sweet flute melody filled the dim stage and settled us into our new world. Every movement of the dancers was calculated and exact yet graceful and seemingly effortless. This ceremonial piece, performed to remember tradition and pass it on to other generations, was one of custom and symbolism.

Throughout the dances that followed, the dancers presented aspects of both spiritual beliefs and daily customs. In Grass Dance, a piece performed by four dancers accompanied only by a drum, the young men simulate grass as they prepare the ceremonial clearing.

Eastern Woodlands Suite, a collection of eight dances, celebrates different animals, mother earth and even war. This piece demonstrated the vital importance of community, as each dancer and musician had an individual contribution to a larger, unified form of expression. As in nature, the relativity of each performer to the others demonstrated the need for balance and cooperation.

My favorite piece, the Apache Grand Dance, exhibited the beauty of simplicity. One performer played an endearing melody on his recorder, the singular sound of which almost brought tears to my eyes. This music was performed with more than appreciation by the musician, it seemed to be played for the one indulgent pleasure of hearing and feeling nothing else. Peace of solitude and the importance of individual expression were exalted in this work.

Two other show-stoppers proved to be the Fancy Shawl Dance and the Hoop Dance. In the first, women don colorful shawls and celebrate the legend of the butterfly. Spirited steps symbolize the butterfly's freedom and new life after the death of her mate.

The Hoop Dance brought the audience to their feet. The dancer manipulated many reed hoops to form different animals and natural things like flowers and birds. He did this without remaining still at any point during the dance, his quick and lively steps as entertaining as the manipulation of the hoops. The structures seemed to evolve from one another, each one connected somehow to the last, as are life forms in nature. The final formation, the earth itself, brought the audience to an explosion of triumphant vindication at the final unification of our world.

The numerous other dances of the show allowed us to experience and learn more about the fascinating cultures of the tribes represented. The costumes were all hand-made, as were ceremonial aids (props) and instruments.

The dances were all traditional and unaltered in the transformation to the stage. It was obvious to me that the dancers were by no means stage performers, but presented these dances to each other, to nature and for traditional cultural purposes.

I was fortunate to have been given an opportunity to experience these forms of expression. I cannot help but think, however, that the dances lost something once confined by our concrete walls. I longed to see these pieces performed in their natural setting, and for the true purposes of the ceremonials.

The other sobering reality of this art form is that it represents a way of life that our nation can't get back. The cultures of the American-Indians who performed Wednesday have been virtually squashed thoughout history. As we celebrate 500 years since Columbus' arrival here, it saddens me to have seen what we gave up all those years ago in deeming this nation America. For all the tributes to earth, nature, truth, wisdom, cooperation, beauty, solitude, community and tradition can truly shed light on where our own "civilization" went wrong.

KW: My name is Kurt Wildermuth. I'm 27 and I'm in the Master of Fine Arts in Creative Writing program of the English dept.
CG:You're a short story writer, whose works have influenced you?
KW: My major influence has been Samuel Beckett and the trilogy of novels; Molloy, Malone Dies and The Unnamable.
CG:Do you ever find yourself emulating Beckett's style as you write?
KW: Constantly. I'm falling into that trap all the time.

Views from the carpets

By Mark K. Anderson
Collegian Correspondent

I'm usually not much of a consumer.

When it comes time to cast my vote in the marketplace, any heartfelt devotion invariably goes to underdog products who don't advertise. It's a real weakness, you know.

Yet two nights ago, I was wooed.

Innocently enough I sat watching a television program long since forgotten when a commercial, itself nothing distinctive, presented a product whose name promised great things. It struck a dark resonance which, if I were in a Karate Kid movie, would have provided sufficient inspiration to make me seek the guidance of a Supreme Cosmic Ninja Master of Two-Fold Dimension And Dirty Drapes That Won't Respond To Woolite.

Touted as a carpet cleaner which even gets out old stains (this seemed impressive at the time), Carpet Science spot and stain remover stood poised to change not only the entire domestic chemical industry but also possibly the very nature of Rugphysic (a word I admit to having made up).

I know a revolution when I see one.

The next morning, at that depressing hour when America's Most Loathsome (morning people, that is) cheerfully greet everything and everyone in sight and probably hum a few Broadway show tunes for good measure, I began the hunt for my very own bottle of magic. After unsuccessfully rummaging the shelves of several local markets, this sleepy-but-enthusiastic consumer found his holy grail and, product in hand, returned home to practice his new found craft: Carpet Science.

Eager for instruction and counsel I called the 800-number on the back of the bottle.

"I'd like to speak to one of your Carpet Scientists please," I gushed.

"Well . . .maybe I can be of some assistance," replied the knowledgeable tele-hack.

We discussed career opportunities in Carpet Science and the hurdles one must clear to pursue such a profession. As far as she knew, the world of academia offered little opportunity to study Carpet Science per se. She had to answer another caller before I could ask her about any qualifying examinations for which an aspiring Carpet Scientist would have to study. (And, I might add, Stanley H. Kaplan wasn't much help in addressing the question either.)

Further research provided little solace. I could find no professional organizations dedicated or even related to Carpet Science, no scientific conferences, no quarterly journals, no Nobel laureates, not even an episode of In Search Of to its credit. Indeed, I began to doubt the very existence of Carpet Science as anything more than a product name.

Just another marketing wank? One can only wonder.

On the other hand, if there is no such profession as Carpet Science, then what credentials have those men in white lab coats on the late-night all-in-one cleaner commercials? Call Liquid Lustre into question and you're asking for trouble, bucko.

There was only one resolution to such a conundrum: Fabricate a Fred-MacMurray-in-Son-Of-Flubberish pleasant ending which would make the (ever so kind) manufacturer of Carpet Science think twice about pressing a libel suit for equating their product to a "marketing wank."

Bearing in mind the recent tendency of the First Amendment to melt like the Wicked Witch of The West for anyone with less than a six-digit income, I spared no expense in ensuring immunity.

Fortunately for all parties involved, there is such a place as Cadillac, Michigan ("The Friendliest Area in Northern Lower Michigan"). (Seriously.) I spoke with Betty at the Cadillac Town Hall and, after agreeing to withhold her name, was able to hammer out a Friendly Conclusion.

As it turns out, Carpet Science is not listed with the National Academy of Sciences and is never mentioned in Nova because, secretly, it is an Art. And an under-appreciated and under-funded one at that.

Mighty plaid moshes in Noho

By LISA CURTIS

Mighty Mighty Bosstones
September 29, 1992

The white lights spun in a circle on the dark stage, seemingly to herald a space ship's landing. But hark, what's that sound? Bagpipes? It's the Boys in Plaid, The Mighty Mighty Bosstones. Grabbing the microphone with a vengeance and a Dennis the Menace leer, Dickie, lead vocalist, took the stage.

Everyone knows about the 2X Mighty Bosstones at UMass. Infamous for launching themselves off the stage and into the churning mosh pit below, they revel in and encourage the sweaty frenzy of their fans. The audience filled Pearl Street Tuesday night, adding themselves to the seething plaid crowd.

It didn't seem to phase them that I couldn't understand a word of the lyrics. Heck no, there was a lot of base and a thundering rhythm to fuel this crowd. And the true fans knew the words from the Bosstones' album anyway, especially from their latest from Taang! records, More Noise and Other Disturbances.

Typical and musically sounding a little too familiar to some other famous band's music is their latest anthem, "Bad in Plaid." "Polka dots just don't go/ pointy shoes hurt my toes/ paisley makes me nauseous/ when I'm down with plaid be cautious." Sing it, Dickie.

So how was the band? Pretty good. I mean, I was distracted. Randoms kept crashing into me and stepping on me, and the heat was oppressive. When I stepped out of the crowd to catch some cooler air, guys were leaning up against the walls as their sweat literally pooled around them on the cold floor. (Though bouncers were diligent in keeping the stairs clear in case one of the "dancers" had trouble finding their way down the stairs.)

So that you don't think I was lax at my job as reviewer and general enlightener I will comment on the horn section, which is especially worthy of note. The sax player, Dennis, even sang a powerful solo.

And even if I couldn't hear what he was saying, Dickie was charismatic and hysterically funny with his crazed antics. Dickie was pulling fans onto the stage hugging them and chucking them back into the crowd like a used Chiclet.

So the band was fabulous. I loved it. I'd suggest tossing back a few brewskies before you go to their next show. Rumor even has it that they had Pearl Street provide them with about four extra cases of their own before the show, too.

copies of Beckett." So I got rid of them. Those plays don't exist anymore.

CG:Give me 10 authors, 5 male and 5 female, whom you'd suggest to your friends.

CG:What's your personal favorite book?
KW: My very favorite book? Ulysses by James Joyce.

CG:Where does the idea for a story come from?
KW: Lots of places, lots of places. Memories, things I've observed, conversations I've overheard . . .

CG:When do you start working on your idea?
KW: That depends. If I get an idea while I'm working on another story then I'll put it down in my journal. If I'm not working on anything else I'll start right away.

CG:What kind of things does your journal contain?
KW:(Smiling) It's a mess, it contains everything. Thoughts, quotations, words I like . . .

CG:Explain the frustrations which go along with writing.
KW: The frustrations are not being able to write as quickly and as fully as I'd like.

CG:What do you do when that happens? When you're stuck at 2:00 am on that one page which is either going to make or break your story and it isn't coming?
KW: Well, it's seldom that important. If it's not going well I just leave it because life itself is more important than writing. So I put on a record, make a cup of tea and wait until it comes.

CG:And it usually does come?
KW:(Hopefully Grinning) It hasn't failed me yet.

CG:How long are your stories?
KW: They vary from two pages to 22 but they average out at about eight pages in length.

CG:How many do you have lying around?
KW:128. I need 150 for my thesis. I'm working on something now that's going to take place in a very small span of time. It will take place in a matter of minutes but will contain many strands of time. It will project into the future and go back into the past.

CG:Where is the Art in writing?
KW: Well, art can be a hand gesture, so writing would be the capturing of the hand gesture and endowing it with some sort of symbolism.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Financial matters must be handled diplomatically. Give more thought to what you say. Getting better organized will make it easier for you to fulfill your obligations.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You can make your own luck today. Listen attentively to what an older person tells you. Work out a babysitting exchange with a neighbor it you need to have some time alone.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A loved one may take you for granted. Be more assertive. Familiarize yourself with an employer's long-range goals. Spending too much time on minor details would be a mistake.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Continue to take people into your confidence. Even if one door closes, another one opens. Trust your ideas, your way of doing things; you are on the right track.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Key goals are met as you climb the ladder of success. Phone calls, letters and meetings crowd your agenda. You are in the right crowd. Place your trust in respected family members.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Discuss your hopes and dreams with both friends and bigwigs. Voicing your ideas now can lead to a highly profitable collaboration. Join a professional organization.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Decisions can go awry today. Guessing is not good enough—be certain of your facts. Trying to force your will on others will only create enemies.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Marvelous doors are opening to you. Your social or professional life soars to lofty heights. Revolutionize the way you do business. Cutting certain ties with the past helps you move forward.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Tune in to VIPs; they can steer you in the right direction. Participating in a group project makes you look good and, better yet, feel good. Buy new furniture or kitchen appliances.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Solitude is not your cup of tea today. You want to reach out to other people and find out what is new. Contact relatives at a distance. An invitation is forthcoming.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Travel and appointments are subject to mix-ups. Do not leave anything to chance. Getting together with a friend who shares your goals proves inspiring.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Be prepared to give the floor to other people. Your willingness to investigate new methods will impress the top brass. Creative inspiration strikes in science, art and metaphysics.

Entire species of animals have been exterminated, or reduced to so small a remnant that their survival is doubtful. Forests have been despoiled by uncontrolled and excessive cutting of lumber; grasslands have been destroyed by overgrazing...We have much to accomplish before we can feel assured of passing on to future generations a land as richly endowed in natural wealth as the one we live in.

Villone signs, Syracuse caught

The Seattle Mariners have signed former University of Massachusetts left-handed pitcher and Olympic baseball team member Ron Villone, Mariners Vice President of Scouting and Player Development Roger Jongewaard announced Thursday.

"We are extremely pleased to have Ron Villone signed," said Jongewaard. "Ron is a big, tough kid with a strong arm. He's got a very bright future and could be a number one or two starter some day. He's a Jim Abbott-type pitcher with a 92-94 MPH fastball who's not afraid to pitch inside."

As reported in Monday's Collegian, Villone agreed to terms Saturday after Jongewaard flew from Seattle to personally negotiate with Villone. Villone will join the Mariners' Instructional League team in Tempe, Arizona today.

Syracuse, N.Y. (AP) — The long-awaited NCAA sanctions against the Syracuse basketball program came down on Thursday, lighter than expected because of the school's cooperation in the investigation.

The Orangemen are banned from 1992-93 postseason play and the school's entire athletic program was placed on two year's probation as violations were also found in the women's basketball, football, lacrosse and wrestling programs.

The NCAA said the penalties were less than the minimum for major violations because of Syracuse's cooperation in its probe. The NCAA Committee on Infractions stopped short of banning Syracuse from live television appearances, but did assess scholarship and recruiting penalties.

"But for their cooperation, their penalty would have been much greater," said David Swank, dean of University of Oklahoma Law School and chairman of the committee.

Syracuse chancellor Kenneth A. Shaw said the university would accept the penalties.

Basketball coach Jim Boeheim said his players were disappointed when told of the penalties Thursday morning.

"But this class (of seniors) has been to the last three tournaments and they're going to have to accept it. There are a lot of kids, a majority of kids, who go to college and don't get to go to three NCAA tournaments," he said.

Syracuse is the first member of the high-profile Big East basketball conference to be sanctioned by the NCAA.

The conference's athletic directors will meet Oct. 6-7 at Providence for their regular fall meeting at which time they will vote to decide whether Syracuse can participate in the conference postseason tournament.

"It is my personal position that Syracuse should be allowed to participate," commissioner Mike Tranghese said, referring to the 1993 Big East tournament. Syracuse won the tournament in 1981, '88 and '92.

Anaheim, California (AP) — George Brett Wednesday became the 18th player in history to top the 3,000 career hit mark. His 4-for-5 performance Wednesday put him in select company and keyed Kansas City's 4-0 win over California.

0.75 goals against average) will start in net on Saturday.

Massachusetts will meet up with Xavier the following afternoon. The Musketeers are lead by sophomores Jenny Tombragel and Tricia Feldhaus.

"This Xavier team is very good this year," Rudy said. "They were ranked earlier this season and I wouldn't be surprised to see them return to the top 20."

Rudy will send Skye Eddy (4-0, 0.25 goals against average) out to play net against the Musketeers.

Last week, David Treadwell of the Broncos defeated the overachieving Cleveland Browns by kicking four field goals en route to a 12-0 victory. This Sunday, the all-world defense of the Chiefs travel to Mile High to take on this punchless attack which resembles a wishbone type receiving corp that can't compare to the University of Miami (somewhat like the Patriots). Kansas City may have problems with the noise of the home crowd, but will overcome it on their way to a huge win in the AFC West. Kansas City 17, Denver 10.

(Insert drum-roll here) The Game of the Week is finally upon us, with the number one ranked Philadelphia Eagles playing host to the second ranked Dallas Cowboys. This battle of undefeateds is on Monday night for the whole world to see. Randall Cunningham leads the Eagles' offense, which has been given new blood with the addition of Herschel Walker.

Walker, who trails his counterpart Emmitt Smith of Dallas for the NFC lead in rushing, may be looking to avenge his trade of 1987 which started the Cowboys rebuilding quest.

Dallas' defense will have to prepare for a healthy Eagles receiving corps, which may suffer from the loss of Mr. Jackson. The defensive line of the Cowboys must contain Randall if Charles Haley is going to have any chance of wrapping him up.

One key to this game will be special teams, in which Dallas flourishes by blocking punts and returning kicks for scores. However, with the home crowd and the youth of the Cowboys d-backs, I hope I'm wrong, but Jimmy Johnson's team will go home with its first loss. Philadelphia 27, Dallas 23.

Field hockey faces UVA, Old Dominion

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

"One game at a time," may not be the wittiest sports cliche ever uttered by an athlete or coach, but it concisely describes the philosophy of the University of Massachusetts field hockey team this year.

The Minutewomen will have to stick to it today as they face the University of Virginia tonight at 6:00 p.m. in Norfolk, Virginia, because if they look ahead to their Sunday showdown with the number one team in the country, Old Dominion, they could easily have a 0-2 road trip.

The Cavaliers (5-1-1) are ranked No. 15 in the country, and are certainly no pushover. Their offense is led by forwards Nicole McNichol who leads the team with five goals, and Kristen Daddona, who has netted four goals thus far and leads Virginia in points with nine.

The Cavalier defense has been helped by the play of goalie Denise Wernersbach, who carries two shutouts and a 1.29 goals-against average into tonight's contest with the Minutewomen.

Friday's game definitely is overshadowed by the impending matchup with the Lady Monarchs of Old Dominion.

Old Dominion has ruled collegiate field hockey like monarchs, winning two NCAA championships in a row. They have not lost since 1990, and UMass head coach Pam Hixon said she thinks Old Dominion may be better.

"Their penalty corner is more potent than ever," Hixon said. "I hate to go into a game thinking we're going to lose, but we're going to totally change our playing style.

"They have four players from foreign countries, and six other players on the U.S. National team, so I'm going into the game like we're playing a National team."

Old Dominion sports a 9-0 record this year, destroying every opponent by at least five goals. Stanford, a team the Minutewomen beat 3-1, lost to Old Dominion 14-0. The Lady Monarchs have outscored their opponents 73-1, and anything less than another undefeated record will be a disappointment for the team.

As for UMass, just staying close to Old Dominion could be considered a moral victory, for a two or three-goal loss might very well bump them up in the rankings, possibly as high as number two. UMass is hoping for contest like last year's, one in which the Minutewomen stayed close but lost 1-0 in Amherst.

"It all depends on if we can control the ball," Hixon said. "If we can hold onto the ball, we can stay close. When you have the ball, you can score. If we turn the ball over, it won't be as close."

JOSH REYNOLDS/ COLLEGIAN
The University of Masschusetts field hockey team travels to Norfolk, VA where they will face Virginia today at 6:00 p.m. and No. 1 ranked Old Dominion Sunday at 2:00 p.m.

Dallas-Philly heads Week 5

Wake up, football fans, because Stapleton's pigskin crystal ball says this weekend should produce some of the best games seen since last year's playoffs.

First, though, we'll give out the weekly awards for the highs and lows achieved on or around the gridiron.

Babe "I'm a loser" Laufenberg award: This one belongs to SundaySports Live, that new mockery of ESPN's Sportscenter on Channel 40. It is hosted by Jim "I belong on Sesame Street" Cline and Mike Ratte. We should gather up the Collegian sports staff and take over that sad show.

Stud of the Week: There weren't too many eye-poppin' performances last week on the field in the NFL, due to the NFC East's bye week. However, someone close to UMass had a great game, and he is none other than Rene Ingoglia, rushing for 148 yards in his first start. He was edged out by Phillipa Scott for the Collegian Athlete of the Week, but we all know this award is more prestigious.

The rankings this week: NFC, 1. Eagles 2. Cowboys 3. Redskins 4. 49ers 5. Bears; AFC, 1. Bills 2. Oilers 3. Dolphins 4. Chiefs 5. Steelers.

O.K., enough boring you with hype, off we go to the prognostications, where our trip takes us north to Rich Stadium in Buffalo.

Arthur
STAPLETON

The Bills enter the game on an offensive rampage, scoring over 37 points per game. The Dolphins appear to be the only threat as of Week 5 to Buffalo repeating as divisional champion. Coming off a pounding of New England, Jim Kelly and company may look past the Dolphins, after their sluggish performance against Seattle.

Buffalo's defense is once again playing at a Super Bowl level, and they have the advantage over the inferior Dolphin receiving corp (minus Mark Clayton, who is injured). The addition of Keith Jackson will give Super Dan just one more target to throw to, but he won't be as effective as Coach Shula would like for his first game. I'd love to pick the Fish, but to the chagrin of many fans, I'll go with the favorite. Buffalo 27, Miami 24.

No one this season expected Detroit to be 1-3 after four weeks. A loss to Tampa Bay in the Silverdome last week may have shattered the Lions' confidence. Barry Sanders has been held in check so far this season, and the problem could be the untimely death of lineman Eric Andolsek in the off-season.

Detroit must rebound this week against the intimidating defense of the Saints (2-2), who lost on Sunday night to San Francisco. Sanders has to explode in order for the passing game of the Lions to be effective (my guess is that he will). Detroit 23, New Orleans 17.

No. 5 women travel to Cornell

By DAN WETZEL
Collegain Staff

To whom much is given much is expected.

Now that the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team (8-0) has been given the title of the fifth best team in the nation, it is expected to play like it.

On Wednesday, versus Dartmouth, the Minutewomen didn't.

"We will have to play better than that this weekend," Massachusetts coach Jim Rudy said. "We were really fortunate today, this was not pretty."

What Rudy was referring to was the lackluster play of his team against the Big Green. The Minutewomen were unable to get on track against Dartmouth, a team which has traditionally played UMass tough.

However, the unranked Green, posted only sporadic attacks and in the second half, UMass upped its intensity and forward Kim Eynard banged in her fourth game winner of the year.

"We can win every game but we have to play up to our capabilities and Wednesday we did not do that," goal keeper Skye Eddy said. "Previously this year we have been playing as a team and that makes a big difference."

Rudy said, "We have the potential to win them all but we can't cut the games so close."

This weekend, the Minutewomen will be playing against competition which may not allow them a bad half.

On Saturday, UMass will face the 17th ranked Cornell Big Red. Cornell is a strong defensive team who rely on forwards Amy Finklestein and Meredith Wilner for scoring punch.

"Cornell is a tough, well balanced team," Rudy said. "Their new people are quite good."

The Minutewomen defeated Cornell 1-0 last year, in Amherst, on the strength of a Polly Hackathorn goal and the shutout goaltending of Briana Scurry. Scurry (4-0,

Men's soccer ready for Siena

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

Every game after a loss is a big game.

That is a fact Sam Koch and his University of Massachusetts men's soccer team will deal with when the Minutemen host the Siena Saints Saturday (Garber Field, 2:00 p.m.).

UMass is coming off a disappointing 2-1 defeat suffered at the hands of Providence College. It was only the second loss on the season for the Minutemen, whose record now stands at 5-2-1 overall, 3-0-1 in the Atlantic 10.

The last time the Minutemen lost (a 3-1 decision to Dartmouth) they responded with a big 2-2 tie on the road against two-time defending A-10 champ, Rutgers. Koch remembers how the team responded then and expects the same now.

"I really would not want to be Siena right now," he said. "I would be very, very surprised if the team is not ready."

The Saints, a member of the Mid Atlantic Athletic Conference (MAAC), enter Saturday's contest with a 3-3-1 record overall, 1-1 in the conference.

Leading the offense is freshman sniper Tom Sewell, a midfielder, has five goals and an assist for a total of eleven points on the year. Other big contributors for Siena include Steve Karbowski and Tim Harding.

Karbowski, a sophomore midfielder, has four goals while Harding, a freshman midfielder, has three goals.

On the defensive side of the field, the Saints are solid. In between the pipes, sophomore Brett Boskiewicz mans the net. Boskiewicz has posted one shutout on the year while compiling a 1.84 goals-against average.

Defense is one thing the Minutemen will have to improve on after their performance against Providence. Koch believes that the defense is a key.

"We gave them (PC) too many chances and they took advantage of it," he said.

"I'm very disappointed in the defense, especially in the second half. But," he added, "we'll learn from it".

Game Notes: Sophomore goalie Mark Wolf is questionable for Saturday's game. He's missed the last two games with a hip pointer.

Erick Gruber, a sophomore, has filled in for the last two games. After Siena, the Minutemen travel to Ludlow on Monday night (7:30 p.m.) to meet the Northeastern Huskies.

Bush insists he 'was right' on economy

By ROBERT BURNS
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush said Sunday "technically I was right" in insisting last fall that he nation's economy was not in recession, but said he should have acknowledged that "there's a hell of a lot of people hurting."

Speaking in an interview taped at the White House for CNN's "Larry King Live" talk show, the president said people still have a mistaken impression about the economy's strength.

"Yes, things have been tough, but they haven't been that tough," he said. "There's been some encouraging things. I can click them off for you: interest rates down, inflation down, businesses ready, poised for recovery.

"So when I said there isn't a recession last fall, technically I was right. But I should have done it recognizing that there's people hurting, and I feel it and I knew it then and I know it now," the president added.

Bush acknowledged that voter' discontent with the economy is hurting him in the polls.

"Technically I was right, but don't tell that to the guy that's unemployed, or don't tell it to the family that has a job and wonders if they're going to have it tomorrow. So I could have handled that better."

The hour-long interview was taped in the East Sitting Room of the first family's private quarters. King said Bush had agreed to appear on his show at CNN studios sometime before Election Day for a live interview that would include calls from viewers.

Democratic presidential nominee Bill Clinton and his running mate, Sen. Al Gore, are scheduled to appear on King's show and take viewers' calls Monday evening.

Earlier Sunday, in comments aimed at Hispanic voters, Bush said that in a second term he would increase U.S. pressure on Cuba to abandon communism. He predicted that Fidel Castro "will fall of his own weight."

"He's still denying human rights there, he is still putting the arm on his people and crushing them down, and he can't go on," Bush said in an interview with a Spanish-language television talk show to be broadcast by Telemundo on Monday.

RA target of racial attack

Vandalism latest in series of Washington incidents

By TOM HALLER
Collegian Staff

"They've destroyed the floor," were the words spoken by Arlens Barosy, the resident assistant for the 17th floor of Washington Tower, as he came home to find his floor literally torn apart and defaced with racial slurs.

Damage on the floor included destruction of the bulletin board, smeared human feces on the floor outside his door, and several racial slurs and symbols on the bathroom, hall, and stairwell walls and his door.

This kind of harassment is not new for Barosy and his hallmates. He and his floor have been plagued with hate crimes and vandalism for the past several weeks, beginning with the flood which left the floor and its residents' belongings extensively damaged.

"This is our home," said Barosy, shaking his head. "Who wants to come home to this?" Barosy has been the subject of other attacks leading up to this weekend's events.

According to police reports, last weekend, Barosy, who is Black, was physically assaulted by a White male whom he had asked to pour out containers of alcohol he and several others were drinking by the 17th floor elevator. Barosy said most of the group fled down the stairwell, but five remained, refusing to dispose of their drinks.

Barosy said one member of the group punched him three times in the stomach and jumped into the descending elevator. Barosy said he pursued the individual via the stairs and met him down in the lobby.

He said the man then attacked him and grasped him by the neck, yelling, "Next time you f— with me I'm going to kick your ass, you Black motherf——." The assailant fled, and was not seen again by Barosy until the following Friday.

Police reports say last weekend's incident is still under investigation for possible Civil Rights violations. Police reportedly told Barosy that those suspected of involvement in the incident were identified from a residential sign-in sheet as non-University students.

Friday evening, Barosy said he spotted one of the members of last weekend's group entering the residence hall. He said he then followed the man up to the eighth floor, where he was apparently staying as a guest of a

EPA declares UMass toxic site in report

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts at Amherst is one of 33,000 toxic sites in the United States, according to a Neighborhood Toxic Report prepared by the federal government's Toxic Release Inventory and Superfund database.

The report lists the University as an "Environmental Protection Agency Superfund site." This means the University and other sites throughout the country are under a current "low-priority" investigation for future waste clean-up.

James P. Fox, the senior hazardous waste officer from University Environmental Health and Safety, has been involved with investigating on-campus chemical waste deposits since late 1983.

"Right now, the ball is in the EPA's court. They will generate a recommendation with an idea as to what preliminary work needs to be done to assess a full game plan," said Fox. "When is anybody's guess."

In 1983, EHS Director Don Robinson asked Fox to investigate a memorandum which dated back to the seventies and referred to a chemical disposal site at the northwest end of campus.

Fox says he was able to discover two sites, a 7-acre plot and a 1-acre plot, that both contained about 10 waste burial sites.

The land was chosen, Fox says, because of its heavy clay content which protects against leakage of waste materials and is therefore safer for the environment.

Prior to this mid-'70s memorandum, several University departments buried waste 15 to 20 feet under ground.

But campus officials are unclear as to what type of waste was buried because there are no written inventories.

"Obtaining a resolution to a matter like this is akin to searching for a needle in a haystack," said Fox. "It's not entirely that difficult — but it's close."

After notifying the EPA, Fox says he accompanied an EPA inspector on two different investigations of both sites. Each time, they failed to find the exact locations of the burial sites.

Fox says tests of the areas to detect surface migration of chemicals or chemical remains turned out negative. These findings seem to describe the University as a low priority site but no official EPA designation has been handed down yet.

Women of color discuss the problem of violence

By SANDRA ROSE
Collegian Staff

A group of concerned women of color met Thursday at the Campus Center to discuss violence against women of color. An issue that many present said is not being addressed by state, UMass, and the local agencies that provide services for women.

"Women of color are four times more likely to get raped than White women," Shyamala Ivatury, co-facilitator of the meeting, pointed out from an FBI report.

"Women of color are sexually and racially harassed and discriminated against at this university, yet there are no avenues for them to pursue proper counselling or advice," Cara Lee Birch, co-facilitator, stated.

Other women expressed concern that there was no safe place for them to meet and felt very isolated.

"Cultural centers do not address violence and the Everywoman's Center is not accessible to women of color," Quynh Dang, UMass alumna, said. "In parallel, the way White men treat White women is how White women treat women of color," she concluded.

The group also discussed the negative stereotypes of women of color that perpetuate the violence.

"We are taught to tolerate and accept our circumstance," one woman said, who wishes to remain anonymous.

The women explained that differences in culture, language barriers, and lack of funds make it impossible for women of color to seek assistance and resources.

There is little being done by the administration yet the need is great and violence against women of color is increasing, most present at the meeting concluded.

Alternative solutions such as a separate space for women of color or the creation of services for women of color were also mentioned.

The group plans to meet again Thursday, Oct. 8, at 7 p.m. at the Campus Center.

Tribe survives Columbus

WORCESTER, Mass. — By the time Columbus got around to searching for a new route to the east, the Nipmuc tribe had been here for 9,000 years.

"There's no going back on" what has happened in the 500 years since, said Frederick Freeman, a director of the Nipmuc Tribal Project, which sponsored a weekend event to promote awareness of the tribe. But "this is part of your history as well. There are lessons that need to be shared for the betterment of all. Let's preserve some of the good in our culture."

The program, called "Surviving Columbus," included drumming, chanting and singing, as well as performances by American Indian artists in what project director Thomas Doughton called "a celebration of the survival of native culture in the region."

A related exhibit, called "Columbus: Through Native Eyes" opened Sunday at the Children's Museum in Boston.

Museum officials said they hoped "to begin to balance the story."

Miniature dioramas show contemporary native people and Columbus through each other's eyes. Another section shows how some Native Americans were captured as slaves and forced to mine gold for the Spanish.

The Nipmucs' territory was call Nipnet and extended from what is now the New Hampshire border into Worcester County.

"It's not taught in the schools," Jim Lewis, a member of the board of directors of the Nipmuc Tribal Project, told the Telegram & Gazette of Worcester.

Literary life

"We're on a roll," exclaims Bruce Wilcox, director of the University of Massachusetts Press, which last year received the coveted New England Booksellers Association "Publisher of the Year" award.

The press, which publishes between 30 and 40 scholarly books a year, recently enjoyed front-page reviews of their work in the New York Times Book Review and the London Times Literary Supplement, says Wilcox.

"We've received a lot of review attention," Wilcox says. "Sales are considerably up and this occurred in a recession."

Before a book is published through the University Press, it passes through a gauntlet of critical reviews before an editorial board comprised of faculty members.

"We're open to anyone writing serious scholarly work that deserves publication," Wilcox says. But the writers, who originate not only from within the University but also throughout the country and world, don't publish through the University to reap financial rewards.

"They don't do it for the money. They really receive minimal royalties," says Wilcox. "They want to see their books well-produced and well-marketed."

The following are some recent releases from the University Press:

• Uncritical Theory: Postmodernism, Intellectuals and the Gulf War, Christopher Norris. This work describes the unreal assertions of Jean Baudrillard and other postmodernist thinkers that the Gulf War was a "hyperreal" event. Personally, I though it was one long CNN "Special Report."

• Hard at Play: Leisure in America, 1840-1940, edited by Kathryn Grover. These are original essays which examine the role of leisure in American culture before the age of Nintendo, from roller skating and riflery to photography and "free play."

• Destiny and Race: Selected Writings, 1840-1898, by Alexander Crummell, edited by Wilson Jeremiah Moses. A major nineteenth-century reformer and intellectual, an Episcopal minister and the first Black American to graduate from Cambridge University, Crummell (1819-1898) wrote pioneering works on Black nationalism, Black self-determination and Pan-Africanism.

He was a strong influence on many African-American leaders of his time, including W.E.B. DuBois, who devoted a chapter to Crummell in The Souls of Black Folk. Despite his importance to African-American history, Crummell is little known today.

• Homeless*sness: New England and Beyond*, edited by Padraig O'Malley, preface by Raymond L. Flynn. There are an estimated three million homeless in the United States, most of them children, women, veterans, the elderly and the mentally ill. But there also millions more teetering on the edge of homelessness.

With contributions from over 60 writers from varied fields, the books covers the particular problems of the six New England States. Some chapters discuss Hartford's mentally ill, tent cities in Lowell and the media coverage of the homeless in Boston.

• Late Fire, Late Snow, Robert Francis. A nationally acclaimed Amherst poet, Robert Francis continued to write and receive recognition for his work right up until his death in 1987 at age 85. He received an honorary Ph.D. from the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, in 1970.

Cycles of sound

Two professors in the University of Massachusetts music department, Charles Bestor and Robert Stern, have received the 1992-93 American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers awards (ASCAP).

Bestor's most recent work is called "Cycles" — a 60 by 30-foot sound sculpture of shifting lights and an electronic musical score.

Stern is currently working on a violin and piano composition commissioned for the reopening of the Coolidge Auditorium at the Library of Congress.

BSU elects top leadership

By MARTIN F. JONES
Collegian Staff

The newly-established UMass Black Student Union held its first election last week for the academic school year. The elections were conducted Wednesday night following the BSU's weekly assembly and continued throughout the following day on the Campus Center concourse.

Fabiola Narcisse, a sophomore majoring in English and Social Thought and Political Economy, was elected president of BSU.

Narcisse, describing her intentions for running for president, expressed her desire to make a positive contribution to the Black community at UMass.

"I knew I wanted to make positive change for the community," said Narcisse. "BSU presented that opportunity and I took it."

Elected to the office of vice-president was Junior Arnold Lizana, who is a double major in Afro-American Studies and Social Thought and Political Economy.

Lizana said that he intends to "help build a strong foundation to insure the future success of the organization."

"It's important that we build this organization the right way," he said. "We are setting the direction for the BSU into the next 10 to 20 years."

Also elected for secretary and treasurer were freshman Patrice Mcneill and Thomas Pace of the UMass men's basketball team.

Both Narcisse and Lizana, who were among the founders of the BSU, have had extensive leadership experience. They were also chosen to serve in their present positions on an interim basis until the elections were held.

Narcisse, who is from Hyde Park, Mass., served as the president of the Afro-American Cultural Society during her senior year at Boston Latin High School.

This past summer, Narcisse participated in a two-week student leadership conference held at Wiliam and Mary College in Williamsburg, Va. which drew prospective student leaders from around the country.

Non-students a source of grief

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

Guests of University students have been causing trouble on campus, according to Joseph Zannini, executive director of Housing Services.

"We have a number of incidents in which the guests of somebody got in trouble," Zannini said. "We in Housing hold you responsible for the improper behavior of your guest. If your guest is going around beating up on someone, obviously that is pretty significant violation and requires a significant reaction."

In the past, non-University students have been charged with such crimes as stealing from residents and yelling racial epithets. Both hosts and guests have been punished, according to Zannini.

Guests of Washington Hall residents have been connected with alleged racial attacks against the residence assistant, Arlens Barosy, over the weekend. According to Washington residents of the 17th floor, the visitors vandalized their floor, scrawled racial slurs and smeared human feces throughout the floor.

In fact, guests of residents have stayed an extended amount of time, said Zannini, which goes against University policy. The visitor, who often pretends they are enrolled in the University, will sometimes take the host's identification.

"[The guests] are not registered as guests. They are squatting in the room," Zannini said.

Even if the guest is not officially registered, whoever allows the visitor to sleep in their room is considered the host. There have been incidents when neighbors have had friends over and asked a friend to host a non-University student, according to Zannini.

"Sometimes students feel a sense of unfairness inadvertently hosting someone," Zannini said. "If you wait to say, 'I wish this person got out of here,' you don't do anything. But if you want, to get a person out. That's responsible behavior. [Housing] want to be helpful. We are not going to turn around and be harsh."

About two years ago a non-University student Joseph Mutau Makau, staying in John Quincy Adams Residence Hall, was charged for raping a 21-year-old male University student in a Southwest parking lot. Only University and continuing education students can live in the dorms.

"We are demanding the host be responsible for guests," Zannini said. "Situations where this occur is really unfortunate. It is not our desire to turn guests away."

student. Barosy said he informed Norman Hiza, the residence director, who then called the police.

No arrests have been made. However, according to police officers, the individual later admitted to his participation in the assault.

Two hours later, Arlens returned to find his floor in shambles.

One eyewitness described the scene as "horrifying, disgusting." Moise Tirado, a Southwest residence assistant, commented, "You can't study and deal with this at the same time. It's just not right."

The residents of the 17th floor, as well as other Washington floors, came together to help clean up while Barosy spoke with police officer Thomas O'Donnell.

Officer O'Donnell assured Barosy that the case would be reported to the detective bureau and an investigation would be made, but refused to give any other information. O'Donnell's only comment was "Well, now it's off your door."

In response to Officer O'Donnell's comment, Tirado asked, "How well are the police really protecting us?

"The school's not willing to do anything," he said. "Something has got to be done."

As Arlens Barosy stood staring at yet another racial epithet scrawled on his door Sunday morning, he quietly stated, "This is a very bad situation Blacks are facing in this school. I don't think any race should be open to it.

"Unfortunately hatred in people is so strong that they don't think about what they're doing, or who they're doing it to," he added.

UMass: the friendly place

I'd like to say a few words about my first weeks on campus, and I'm probably going to surprise most of you in that what I have to say is relatively positive. While I share the trials of the "grade D but edible" dining commons food, the marathon walks to and from class, and the empty-pocket syndrome due to the insane, ever-sky-rocketing textbook prices (I've never heard of having to pay for a syllabus, either), I wish to accentuate something I was quite delighted by: the University and the students themselves.

MERRICK

Having spent my first two years of college hell life at Glassboro State College, New Jersey, I'm among a sea of faces here, but found the adjustment much simpler and more pleasant than expected. I was overwhelmed by how much more open, responsive and overall nicer my peers here are.

No, I can't say I haven't encountered the occasional loudmouth, creep or cretin (a good term would be "Masshole"); there's one in every crowd. But I can't get over how strong an improvement it is over my former school. At the 'Boro, it seemed almost no one had a pleasant personality and I rarely heard, "Hello," or, "What's up/how's it going?" — the basic tools of conversation. A smile was usually a total sin, I'd begun to suspect. I'm not pulling any punches — I hated that hole, and I'm glad my route of transfer and escape was UMass at Amherst.

I've talked to friends (transfer and non) from this campus and their accounts, for the most part, match up well: the pool of people here are, for whatever reasons, easier to get to know.

At Glassboro, I recall my best friend repeating how fake, two-faced and impossible the fellow students there were. And he's an easy-going person, not unlike myself, although I suppose I tend to analyze people too much. Perhaps I should drop journalism and take up sociology. Hmmm.

I've made as many friends in two weeks as in two semesters or even two years at Glassboro, and something must be said for that. I didn't change a whole hell of a lot. And while individuals pop in and out of someone's life (that's the case anywhere, anytime) the transition here is more merciful at any rate.

Enough about all that. Concerning the physical aspect, Glassboro State isn't a pimple on UMass. Of course, my former home of higher learning was a mere state school of approximately 9,500 students while this place sees ever 23,000 faces, but even proportionately the alternatives and entertainment are altogether more accomodating. Bluntly, there's more to do. At G'Boro, I spent weekend after another nearly bored to tears. It was a ghost town, and I felt that the administration saw it a privilege and a favor that they were even giving me a room to hide in from the rain.

While the Sylvan area of UMass isn't Disney World, it's a haven compared to the best dorms Glassboro had to offer. Plus, this isn't so much a suitcase college, either; more people hanging around usually means more to do. That helps.

The basic point I'm conveying is that I want to thank those I've met for contributing to the relaxed atmosphere I've seen here, and that for those who've been at the realm of the Minutemen for a year or two and don't particularly like it, just ponder on where you could be.

Yeah, I'm a happier man. But excuse me — I've gotta walk the mile and a half to Bartlett by 11:15; I'm late again.

Media is feeding scraps to a desperate public

There is one group of people who are ecstatic that Ross Perot has re-entered the presidential race, happier even than the increasingly small number of citizens who plan to vote for him. For journalists, the little Texan's change of heart is a godsend Starting Friday a flood of comment and analysis began flowing that will keep political pundits in overdrive until November; then, of course, the political scientists will begin their assault on the mass of statistics produced in the campaign and election.

Jesse
ARMSTRONG

Never before have there been so many column inches in so many newspapers, so much air time on so many radio stations, or so many hours on so many TV channels, and all of it cries out: FILL ME!

Although Perot will be reviled by many for his inconsistency, one has to admire the sheer gall of the man. Hounded by searching questions on his dubious views and past he simply withdraws from public view for two months, only to return with a massive injection of free publicity and the credibility granted by the respect shown to him by the grovelling emissaries of the two established parties.

In a sense Perot's re-entry is a perfect story for the voracious media; it allows for endless pontification, it calls for graphs and specialist analysts, and yet all the time the debate takes place in some other, separate media-reality, largely unrelated to the world we know and exist in.

It is a curious anomaly that the ever hungry American media allows itself such narrow hunting grounds. There is an avalanche of comment on the election and Perot and debate formats and campaign managers, etc., etc., but where are the articles and news reports on why only half the U.S. electorate bother to turn out even for the presidential election? Who is asking what this says about the reality of democracy, and how the American people judge their power to effect change?

The spheres that established journalists and reporters allow themselves to operate in are saturated; they dissect the smallest issue into a hundred component parts. Hence the mediocre is praised and the okay is hoisted hero-high. Lloyd Bentsen's putdown of Dan Quayle in the 1988 vice-presidential debate was okay; "Senator, you're no Jack Kennedy," has a nice ring about it, but to hear the commentators talk of it one might think Bentsen had topped the Gettysburg Address for rhetorical skill.

The American public is like a dog sniffing through its own vomit, desperately looking for something worthy to ennoble, but because of the terrible lack of intelligent debate the people who "make up the media" end up elevating some scrap of truth into a piece of political wisdom to be handed down from generation to generation.

This is the country where the need for something — anything! — to say or write is turning the seasons into marketable media events. One can foresee the day when there are autumn correspondents for the major networks, CNN coverage of the first leaf-fall, "Fall '92" T-shirts, mugs, chewing gum, commemorative leaves, maybe a celebratory single. Yes, I think this is a highly underdeveloped market. . .

Jesse Armstrong is a UMass student.

Motivations must be considered

Going to war shouldn't be considered by an incumbent president in order to win favor with voters. During and prior to the Gulf War the country rallied around Bush. The polls showed he had his largest approval rating ever.

However, the swing in popularity since the war has been drastic. His opponent, Bill Clinton, has consistently led in the polls by 8-15 percent over the last month. The change mostly credited to the economic situation. What would an ambitious, intelligent man do faced with the possibility of losing the incredible power of the office he presides over?

An ambitious, intelligent man would step back and review his options. An economic recovery is highly improbable this close to the election. Strong showings in debates and vigorous campaigning don't seem like enough to swing support in his favor. There are only five weeks left. What action can he take to gain a large amount of public supprt quickly?

An ambitious, intelligent man would look to his past success and take advantage of the present unrest in Yugoslavia. He may see the correlation between public support and war. Like Operation Desert Storm the action would be one taken by the United Nations. But, like Operation Desert Storm, the majority of troops sent to fight would be from the United States. An opportunistic man may capitalize on Yugoslavia's situation to obtain popular support. Regardless of the outcome, the motivation behind our involvement must be questioned. Would this be a campaign ploy or would our involvement be out of genuine moral concern? It may not be so clear cut, but if there is no involvement, the voter must question the motivation.

AASA denounces racial harassment

It has recently been brought to the attention of the Executive Board of the Asian American Students Association (AASA) an incident of racial harassment which occurred on campus.

Our group's constitution our mission is: "To create a supportive atmosphere for all Asian and Asian American Students at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst." We, as a registered student organization, strive to create understanding, education and mutual respect to fight prejudice, a leading cause of racial harassment.

It is not within our jurisdiction to act but knowing that incidents of harassment do occur is unsettling. We acknowledge there is no ultimate solution, that is, an end to all incidents of racial harassment. We hope this incident is fully investigated and justly dealt with.

We cannot condone acts of intolerance and must condemn harassment of any form.

The 1992-1993 Executive Board of the AsianAmerican Students Association

Chancellor takes steps to resolve conflicts

We begin this academic year pleased to have both the largest freshman class since 1988 and increased state funding. But we still face many challenges. I want to address multiculturalism and problem resolution.

Our efforts to achieve a truly multicultural, vibrant community must continue; we must find new ways to serve those communities formerly served by Upward Bound; we must continue to support those who are working to free our campus from the ugliness that comes from racist, sexist, anti-Semitic, homophobic and other intolerant attitudes and actions. I have sought help by appointing a Multicultural Advisory Board chaired by Fred Tillis, and had a first meeting with them that has been very valuable.

If we are to make progress the administration, faculty, staff and students must be willing to engage in dialogue and cooperative efforts. No segment of the community is absolved from a responsibility to be a part of the solution. My colleagues in the administration and I are willing to meet members of the community, individually or with small groups of representatives, to discuss their concerns. A call or letter to our offices can initiate such meetings.

There will be times when someone finds these routes ineffective. A new process called "Procedures for Protest of University Policies by Campus Groups" has been put in place to facilitate communication between members of the administration and concerned groups. These procedures were developed by the Civility Commission to ensure that all members of the community have adequate access to University decision-makers to discuss concerns and seek resolution. Information about these procedures is available at the Ombuds Office in the Campus Center, as well as a the Offices of the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and the Dean of Students. Essentially they involve the use of the Ombuds Office to help resolve problems such as those which caused disruptions last academic year.

These procedures are designed to achieve constructive institutional self-examination and, when needed, appropriate change. Let us discard the ways of violence, threats, occupations and confrontations. However good are the ends which they are designed to achieve, such hostile means are wrong and the campus cannot tolerate them.

The campus has been and will continue to be a place that supports and promotes constructive debate and dialogue. I look forward to meeting with many of you as we work together to resolve lingering problems in order to bring this campus closer to the ideal which we all seek.

Cutter interviews a self-masochist

By CUTTER GARCIA
Collegian Staff

This is part II of a SPOTLIGHT interview with graduate student Kurt Wildermuth.

CG: Did you have some sort of an epiphany which made you want to become a writer? Some largely dramatic moment when you realized,"Hey — this is what I want to do."
KW: I've never had an epiphany. [Writing] is a constant series of decisions for me. I can't stand it when I'm not writing but by the same token I can't stand it when I am. I've nearly stopped doing it countless times.
CG: So writing is a "self-masochistic" activity?
KW:(Smiling wryly) Well, it can be. But I find that the things I've discovered along the way are worth whatever pains and self doubts that creep in during the process. I haven't found anything else I'd rather do.
CG: What is Kurt Wildermuth's philosophy on life?
KW:(A long,pondering pause ensues — at least a minute of silence — as he thinks. Then he answers.) I don't want to define life because it's so rich in contradictions. There are just so many contradictions out there. Life is constantly changing.
CG: In the first meeting of English 254, Reading and Writing Imaginary Fiction, you ask your class 'What five purely selfish things would you take with you if you were going to be alone on a desert island, besides those things which are for basic survival.' Let's turn the tables. What does Kurt Wildermuth take?
KW: (laughing) Oh let's see. He takes a book — Ulysses. He takes a record — Funhouse by the Stooges. A movie — Citizen Kane. He takes a never ending notebook and a never ending pot of coffee.
CG: To a writer, the written word is a powerful tool which can be used in many ways to achieve varied results. What kind of power do you feel that the written word has?
KW: Countless power. It can convey both the inside and the outside at the same time. Through both sound and sense you can convey different layers of reality and that can somehow enrich experience — it can make the most banal episode in someone's life more significant. That's from John Cage. Make sure he gets in there as a major influence.
(I am still looking for people to interview so if you know someone who is a student here at UMass, is involved in ANY and all aspects of art and who deserves some recognition for their craft — then come on down to the COLLEGIAN offices and leave me a note in the ARTS mailbox with a name,phone number and general description of what it is they do. Thanks!) — CG

Tales of the Beanworld
by Larry Marder
Beanworld Press

Last week I said I was going to tell you all about a comic so good that it would enrich your soul, that reading it would clear up your acne, make you a better lover and generally leave you feeling at one with the universe.

Alright, alright, so there aren't any

COMICS BY LARRY MARDER
Excerpt from Tales of the Beanworld

documented cases of acne having been cleared up, and whether or not you become a better lover is best left up to each individual's subjective interpretation. But if any comic is going to enrich your soul, it's Larry Marder's Tales of the Beanworld. It's that good.

In his introduction to the first collection, Scott McCloud makes a very strong argument that, more so than any other comic, Beanworld is a different work for each person who reads it.

Some people read it for whimsical adventure and the pure delight that Marder takes in storytelling, some for the philosophical insights into love and art. Some people read it as a breathtakingly simple metaphor for the complexities of deep ecology, and use it to help teach some of the basic concepts of the interdependence of all life. Some people read it as a puzzle, pouncing on every scrap of a clue and expounding endless theories as to how things happened and why things happened and what's going to happen next. Some people read it as a creation myth, a peek into the Dreamtime of a primitive society, when the first hero is born, when the first work of art is created, when the first questions are asked, when the first lie is told.

I like to think of it as a thought experiment, a way of learning things about ourselves as human beings by closely watching what happens in this alternate world of beans.

The Beanworld is, to use Marder's own words, "a weird fantasy dimension that operates under its own rules and laws." It is the island home of a tribe of beans who lead a simple existence. They have to eat, and so they hunt and gather chow from the Hoi Polloi, but they are conscious of the fact that all life in their little corner of the universe depends on each other for survival, and so they are careful to do nothing to upset their delicate balance.

All is not merely hunting and eating, of course. Occasionally a bean "breaks out," or discovers that there is something more they have to offer the tribe than just the gathering of chow. And so the Boom'r Band plays music and leads the dancing of the beans, and Professor Garbanzo investigates new ways to make tools, and Beanish does his daily Look-See Show. Each one has constructed his or her own identity, as musician, scientist, or artist, and offers the tribe a service in return for chow.

The stuff of basic anthropology. Except that in Marder's hands, in this alternate world, it becomes the stuff of magic. The fourth issue, when Beanish breaks out and invents the Beanworld's first art, has been called the best comic ever done (although your correspondent hesitates before stepping out on that limb).

By watching this, by watching Beanish fall in love with his muse, Dreamishness, by watching Professor Garbanzo discover the basic laws of the world around her, by watching Mr. Spook lead the Chow Sol'jer Army on a chow raid, by watching all this happening in this other world for the first time, we can look at art and love and discovery and heroism in a new light, charged with new mystery and magic.

And all this is done in such a seemingly simple fashion, too. The art is very iconic, based heavily on Native American imagery and symbolism, and sometimes seems to have been transcribed directly from a cave wall.

The language is simple and direct, delighting in puns and slang, becoming almost incantatory at times. They combine to have an almost childlike effect, as befits this story of beginnings, origins, and discovery, and yet there is always a deep resonance here that one only finds in the wisest and most mature of stories.

The Beanworld is a wildly original place, and Tales of the Beanworld is a deeply personal vision. No matter what else has been trumpeted as the latest best thing in comics for the past decade, Beanworld has been well out in front of it in showing us what comics are for and what comics can do. And yet Beanworld is also universal in its appeal.

There's only one real problem with Tales of the Beanworld: it doesn't come out nearly often enough. Marder's current job is as advertising director for Moondog's, a large chain of comics stores in the Chicago area, and lately he has been working valiantly to make the world as we know it a safer place for alternative comics everywhere. Which has left him very little time to write and draw.

Still, he has promised a new issue at the beginning of next year, and there are 19 already done — though difficult to find. The first four have been collected into a bound volume, as have the next four, which should be available in a couple of months. So, good luck, and good hunting. Beanworld is more than worth it.

Back issues and the collections are also available from The Beanworld Press, Inc., 1938 N. Sheffield, Chicago, IL, 60614.

Hero doesn't save this writer's day

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Needless to say, I'm a little disappointed with Hero, the new comedy by director Stephen Frears. I was eagerly awaiting Hero since Frears is my favorite director. While it was far from a turkey, Hero can't help but be held up in comparison to Frears' past triumphs.

Stephen Frears first came to attention with his British art house hits such as Sammy and Rosie Get Laid, My Beautiful Launderette (with Daniel Day-Lewis) and Prick Up Your Ears (with Gary Oldman and Vanessa Redgrave).

His first big hit was the seductive and searingly beautiful (not to mention my favorite film ever), Dangerous Liaisons, with Glenn Close, Michelle Pfieffer and John Malkovich. He followed up the Oscar-nominated Liaisons with the naked, nihilistic The Grifters starring Angelica Huston, Annette Bening and John Cusack.

With such a powerhouse history, it was easy for me to hold such high expectations for Hero. Though my hopes were somewhat dashed with this, his latest effort, Hero is still a sly American comedy that dares to challenge the audience and poses questions our usual comedies hardly ever ask. The film is a slightly confused, but always classy satirical comedy.

Hero asks the loaded questions: what makes a hero? Should we believe everything we see on television?

When small-time amoral crook Bernie LaPlante (Dustin Hoffman) happens on a crashed plane, in flames, he reluctantly (and inadvertently) saves the 54 passengers, including hot-shot television reporter Gale Gayley (Geena Davis). When Bernie disappears from the scene, leaving only a single size 10B $100 loafer, Gale begins a search for "The Angel of Flight 104."

A chance encounter between LaPlante and a homeless man John Bubber (Andy Garcia) gives him that certain size 10B shoe. Eyeing the one million dollar reward, Bubber becomes the hero. He looks, acts and feels the part of the hero, inspiring the city.

Meanwhile, LaPlante's life is falling apart. Another chance meeting this time on a ledge of a hotel sparks an inspired ending, resisting Hollywood convention while reveling in it at the same time.

Most of Hero is well-done. Television is the main villain here, the pseudo-inspirational soundbites, playing heavy on the human interest (read: melodrama) and letting the facts fall where they may.

Dustin Hoffman gives a twist on his Midnight Cowboy Ratso Rizzo character, but lets his performance transcend a lame redemption resolution. Bernie is, for the most part, a sleazy S.O.B. and stays that way throughout the flick. There's a particular scene where Bernie says goodbye to his son and ex-wife right before going to prison. Frears uses his now trademark close-up shot and coupled with Hoffman's standout delivery, it nearly drove me to tears. Now, as a jaded, cynical, I've-seen-it-all film critic, that's no easy feat.

It's Hoffman's film, but Geena Davis pushes her way to give the best (by a nose) performance. Although Hero needed to spend more time with her character (same with Garcia), her portrayal is textured and funny. If there's one thing Frears does best, it's his ability to work with actors and bring the best out of them. He did it with Michelle Pfeiffer and Glenn Close, among others. He does it here as well.

Andy Garcia's John Bubber is slightly underwritten. His Bubber is truly a nice guy who conned a city into believing he was their hero. He plays the part with style, and Geena Davis is smoldering — it's too bad their scenes were so short.

Frears is trying for satire, but he falls short. The film also has the mistaken goal of being a Dustin Hoffman vehicle instead of an ensemble. The script, writer David Webb Peoples is smart, the film has keen insights into how we pick (and hold up) our heroes.

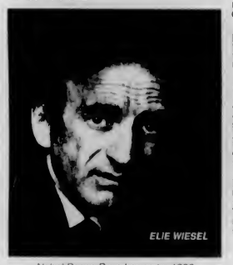
WHAT BEING JEWISH MEANS TO ME



Nobel Peace Prize Laureate, 1986

I remember: as a child, on the other side of oceans and mountains, the Jew in me would anticipate Rosh Ha-Shanah with fear and trembling.

He still does.

On that Day of Awe, I believed then, nations and individuals, Jewish and non-Jewish, are being judged by their common creator.

That is still my belief.

In spite of all that happened? Because of all that happened?

I still believe that to be Jewish today means what it meant yesterday and a thousand years ago. It means for the Jew in me to seek fulfilment both as a Jew and as a human being. For a Jew, Judaism and humanity must go together. To be Jewish today is to recognize that every person is created in the image of God and that our purpose in living is to be a reminder of God.

Naturally, I claim total kinship with my people and its destiny. Judaism integrates particularist aspirations with universal values, fervor with rigor, legend with law. Being Jewish to me is to reject all fanaticism anywhere.

To be Jewish is, above all, to safeguard memory and open its gates to the celebration of life as well as the suffering, to the song of ecstasy as well as the tears of distress that are our legacy as Jews. It is to rejoice in the renaissance of Jewish sovereignty in Israel and the re-awakening of Jewish life in the former Soviet Union. It is to identify with the plight of Jews living under oppressive regimes and with the challenges facing our communities in free societies.

A Jew must be sensitive to the pain of all human beings. A Jew cannot remain indifferent to human suffering, whether in former Yugoslavia, in Somalia or in our own cities and towns. The mission of the Jewish people has never been to make the world more Jewish, but to make it more human.

This season of Rosh Ha-Shanah and Yom Kippur is a good time for thinking about what being Jewish means to you. It is a time for every Jew to explore his or her ties to the Jewish people and to the Jewish heritage.

The American Jewish Committee believes in the future of our people. American Jewry offers an abundance of exciting intellectual, spiritual and cultural opportunities. Jewishness can provide a sense of meaning and of belonging, and a connection to the ideals and aspirations of our people. We believe that every Jewish person should have the opportunity to learn, to experience, and to become involved in Jewish life.

For information on a variety of programs and organizations in the American Jewish community which will help you to explore your connection to Jewish life, write or call us at (212) 751-4000, ext. 267.

Skydiving a hit with students

By PETER WOLLY
Collegian correspondent

They're popping up on college campuses everywhere. More and more students are getting involved. It's more popular than bungee-cord jumping. People are getting high without drugs or alcohol. "It's even addictive," one six month UMass veteran says. It's called skydiving!

Skydiving has been getting to be pretty popular at UMass. Actually, it's been here for 35 years. It's the oldest college skydiving club in the country. The Skydiving Club is run by students and taught by licensed instructors. Skydiver-wannabees take five hours of classroom instruction, on an alternating Thursday of their choice, and on the ensuing Sunday, they're ready to make their first jump.

The planes take off from Turners Falls Airport and the jumps occur at the field right next to the airport.

For those who may be a bit cautious for safety reasons, at the beginning, students start jumping what are called static line jumps. These are jumps where a line from the parachuters backpack is connected to the plane, forcing the parachute to open directly after the jump.

After five of these, the jumper is now allowed to free-fall, meaning he or she can pull their own ripcord. The more jumps one makes, the more freedom he or she gets. For example, after making twenty jumps, thus proving their experience, free-falling until the last possible second may be one of their wishes.

It's $140 for the first jump, with each subsequent jump costing $35.

The student skydiving season runs from March to the end of October, so if you are interested, there is still time this semester to sign up. The club ranges from beginners all the way up to experts. The club is located in the Student Union in room 309.

NHL preseason predictions

Tongue Twisters

Did you ever consider doing the color for the NHL? Well say this 10 times fast: Winnipeg's Nikolai Khaibulin passes out to Alexander Alexeyev, over to Artur Oktyabrev, up to Yevgeny Garanin, who gives it off to Andrei Karpovtsev one times it to Ivan Vologzaninov who shoots and scores.

This rookie line from the Jets is not only a possibility but a color man's nightmare. Anyone wanting to do play-by- play for any NHL game must now possess a PhD in Linguistics.

The Russian Invasion

This season's 1992 NHL entry draft saw a unprecedented influx of European players. In the first round, 11 out of the 24 picks were from across the Atlantic. The Bruins got into the action and selected Russian left winger, Dmitri Kvartalnov, in the first round. Montreal, of all teams, had even selected Hiroyuki Miura from Japan.

The NHL Bad Boys. Will they become extinct?

New rules dealing with fighting have been installed over the summer. The rule says that a player who "instigates" a fight will be thrown out of a game. Last season, in 28 percent of the 735 fights an instigator was penalized. All of the other fights were considered "spontaneous".

So rest easy fight fans, there will be plenty of extra curricular activities spontaneously happening this season.

Dem's Fightin' Words!

Tie "Hard Head" Domi, is the New York Rangers' tough guy and loud mouth. This guy, disguised as a hockey player, always has something to say. He once claimed to have "more lines than (Bob) Probert has teeth."

Detroit's Mr. Probert, no stranger himself to the penalty box, has taken offense to what "Hard Head" (aka s@*# Head) Domi has said. Even with the fighting rules, I'm sure when these two teams collide Dec. 2 , Probert will show Domi his version of the "Irish hand shake" to his chin.

Ericmania

How would you like to be 19 years old, stand 6-5, weigh 235 lbs., and being paid over 3 million a year to play hockey. Eric Lindros likes it.

This kid is making around $36,000 a GAME! In college layman terms he is making enough money in one minute to purchase 10 kegs and pizza with the change.

Even with all this, the Philadelphia Flyers with Eric Lindros aren't expected to make the playoffs this year. It is something that they haven't done since 1988-89. This has not stopped the selling out of season tickets though, once Lindros had signed.

Plus, Flyer shirts with No. 88 are selling like mad for all the Eric Lindros and Flyer bandwagon fans. So in a business sense, the Flyer organization is profiting, but statistically they will be the most watched fifth place team in the league.

Field hockey beats UVA, falls to ODU

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The 1-1 road trip of the University of Massachusetts field hockey team was about the best they could hope for. UMass knew they would have to pull off a miracle to beat No. 1 ranked Old Dominion, so the team made sure they did not take No. 15 Virginia lightly.

It paid off. The Minutewomen (10-1) were on both sides of the fence last weekend, dominating Virginia on Friday for a 4-1 win and being dominated by defending national champion Old Dominion (11-0), losing by a 3-0 count.

Ainslee Press scored two goals less than one minute apart and thoroughly dominated the Cavaliers, outshooting them 37-7. UMass tallied 24 penalty corners while holding Virginia without any.

Press' first goal came with only 3:26 left in the first half. On a penalty corner, Holly Hockenbrock inbounded the ball to Jenn Salisbury, who then assisted to Press for the 1-0 lead.

Press struck again when she slapped in a Hockenbrock feed at 2:30 to put the Minutewomen up by two goals.

Virginia briefly made things interesting when Nicole McNichol scored less than five minutes into the second half. McNichol's goal at 31:22 cut the lead to 2-1, but UMass responded quickly.

Tara Jelley scored four minutes later, at 27:21, taking a feed from Salisbury inside the Virginia circle and beating Cavalier goalie Denise Wernersbach. The Minutewomen would turn the 3-1 lead into a 4-1 final when Danielle Borges scored unassisted with 24:38 left in the game.

UMass goalie Philippa Scott had an easy day, saving only four shots, while Wernersbach sweated a tough Minutewomen offense, making 20 saves.

On Sunday, the Minutewomen lost their first game of the year to Old Dominion, holders of a 47-game unbeaten streak. The Lady Monarchs have not lost since October of 1990, and have ruled collegiate field hockey like a dynasty.

UMass could get in only one shot in the game, that by defenseman Kathy Phelan. For the second time in as many Sundays, a torrential downpour hampered both teams.

Old Dominion got on the board with 10:59 left in the first half when Laura Knorr converted a penalty corner which was assisted by Kelli James and Jill Reeve. The 1-0 score was enough, but Old Dominion added another score before halftime, making things worse for the Minutewomen.

James took a pass from Jen Shepard inside the circle and beat UMass' Scott, who would have 14 saves at the end of the day. If the 2-0 halftime deficit didn't finish the Minutewomen, Maike Hilbrand's goal at 18:13 of the second half did. The 3-0 win for Old Dominion is their closest game to date, which means UMass gave the Lady Monarchs as good a game they've had thus far.

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

Danielle Borges, Tara Jelley and the rest of the UMass field hockey team split their road trip this weekend, defeating Virginia 4-1, but losing to No. 1 Old Dominion 3-0.

Edelman leads men's soccer to win over Siena

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

Randy Jacobs, the UMass men's soccer team's second leading scorer, notched an assist Saturday, helping the Minutemen defeat Siena 4-0.

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

Pressure is what every player feels when under the gun in a big game.

Justin Edelman and the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team kept this pressure on Siena throughout Saturday's game, as they burst out for four goals in the second half, posting a 4-0 win.

Edelman, coming off a tough game in the loss against Providence, bounced back with a strong effort and led the Minutemen (6-2-1) to victory. He scored two goals, lifting his team's lead to 15 (six goals, three assists).

"It was probably the most I've touched the ball in a half all season, which was good for me, and it helped the team," said Edelman.

Siena's game plan appeared to stress defense, and it was somewhat successful in the first half. However, this kept the ball away from its offense, preventing any scoring opportunities for the Saints.

UMass controlled the ball throughout the half, but were tentative on pulling the trigger on several shots, yielding a total of three for the half.

At 46:02 of the game, UMass finally scored its first goal when Edelman put one past Siena sophomore goalie Brett Boskiewicz. The play was set up by junior Matt Edgerly, who was pulled down by a defender, giving UMass an indirect kick just outside the box.

Edgerly tapped the ball to UMass junior forward Randy Jacobs, who fired a shot at the Siena goal. The rebound came out to Edelman at the top of the box, and he ripped one into the net for a 1-0 lead.

This goal was all the Minutemen would need, as sophomore goalie Mark Wolf was back in brilliant form, stifling Siena late in the game with two amazing saves.

"Wolfie came up huge twice (in the second half), and was the difference in the game," said Edgerly.

Less than three minutes later, at 48:52, the UMass scoring barrage continued as co-captain Shawn Bleau headed one past Boskiewicz, putting the game out of reach at 2-0.

Jacobs flipped the ball in front of the net, and Bleau, who did not start because of an illness, met it head on for the score.

UMass' third goal was Edelman's second, at 78:13, assisted by freshman Jeff Claudino and sophomore Stephen Scott. Scott finished out the scoring with a goal from Claudino at 85:19.

The next game for UMass is tonight against Northeastern at Ludlow at 7:30 p.m. According to UMass Head Coach Sam Koch, the Huskies are a "scrappy, hard-running team: the type of team you don't like to play against."

This game may once again be a chance for the Minutemen to reestablish themselves as a force to be reckoned with in New England. However, for now, Coach Koch will worry about how his team feels about itself.

"We have to reestablish ourselves within ourselves, that is the main thing. I care about what we as a team think. We'll worry about what New England thinks come the end of the year."

Women stop Cornell, Xavier to stay unbeaten

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team has a tendency to save its best for last.

The Minutewomen (10-0), once again, relied on a strong second half effort as they won two games this weekend, against Cornell and Xavier, by identical 2-0 scores.

"We're not pretty but we are getting it done."

– Jim Rudy
UMass women's soccer coach

"We're not pretty but we are getting it done," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "Like usual, we did enough to win."

On Saturday, Cornell, ranked No. 17, dominated Massachusetts throughout the first half. The Big Red were able to create numerous scoring opportunities, only to be thwarted by Massachusetts goalkeeper Briana Scurry (5-0, 0.60 goals against average).

"Cornell dominated us," Rudy said. "In the first half, they created more dangerous scoring bids than all our opponents thus far, combined. But our defense was real tough and Bri made some great, cat-like saves."

The Minutewomen, ranked No. 5 nationally, waited until the second half to get on the scoreboard. In the 48th minute, off of a goal kick, Cornell keeper Kate Alexander played the ball up to teammate Erin Murray. Murray tried to play it immediately back to Alexander but UMass' Nicole Roberts intercepted the ball and deftly snaked by the out-of-position Alexander, and shot into the open net.

"Robbie [Roberts] stayed as cool as a cucumber on that play," Rudy said. "It was great hustle on her part which caused the pressure."

Yesterday, Massachusetts followed a similar script against the Xavier Musketeers. Xavier outplayed the Minutewomen in the first half, but UMass' keeper Skye Eddy (5-0, 0.20 GAA) delivered the big saves when needed.

In the 75th minute, Eddy thundered a punt nearly 65 yards, which forward Rachel LeDuc headed up the field and past the defensive line, where Eynard collected it. Eynard drove in alone on Xavier keeper Kelsey Ervick and placed her shot in the far right corner, past the floundering Ervick.

Thirteen minutes later, Eynard popped in her third tally of the weekend. Paula Wilkins served a corner kick toward the goal mouth which teammate Holly Hellmuth headed at Ervick. Eynard stepped in front of the ball and redirected it, with her head, into the right corner of the net.

Bishop Tutu set to address University

By MARTIN F. JONES
Collegian Staff

Nobel laureate Archbishop Desmond Tutu of South Africa is scheduled to address the University of Massachusetts, this afternoon at 4 p.m. in the the Fine Arts Center Auditorium.

The lecture has already been sold out and monitors will be provided for an overflow crowd at the Rand Theater, also located in the Fine Arts Center.

Rev. Christopher Carlisle, who helped arrange Tutu's visit, described the local reaction to his visit as "very electric."

"People are really excited about him coming to UMass," he said. "So far the response has been overwhelmingly positive."

Rev. Carlise responded to the recent wave of racial incidents that have occurred throughout the campus by reaffirming the necessity for Archbishop Tutu's visit to the University.

"The incidents have confirmed my conviction that Bishop Tutu's message of reconciliation is imperative towards creating a truly healthy existence with one another."

Rev. Carlisle met with Tutu yesterday along with Mzamo Mangaliso, a South African professor at UMass, who also helped arrange the visit.

Mangaliso, who first met Bishop Tutu while studying in South Africa during the early 1970's, described him as "a man of broad knowledge and principles."

"He has a great sense of humanity and oneness," said Mangaliso. "He wants to see us loving each other instead of turning against each other."

Ex-UMass police head Hilson fined $4,000

BOSTON (AP) - The former director of public safety for the University of Massachusetts at Amherst was fined $4,000 by the State Ethics Commission and ordered to forfeit a $1,000 gift from an employee to the state.

Arthur Hilson did not contest the judgment, according to the State Ethics Commission.

The commission said Hilson borrowed $1,000 from another public safety worker, Erma Rocasah, to purchase meat. He signed a promissory note for the loan, calling for no interest payments.

A month later, Rocasah later came under investigation by Hilson. She was suspected of embezzling $15,000. Rocash resigned her position with the Public Safety Department.

Hilson telephoned Rocasah at her home. During the call Rocasah asked when she was going to be arrested and taken to jail, but Hilson told her not to worry because the University simply wanted its money back and planned to handle the matter internally, according to the commission.

Hilson said he responded to Rocasah's question by stating the matter was out of the University's hands, and with the Distrcit Attorney's Office. But, according to the commission, the District Attorney's Office played no role in the matter until later in the year.

Hilson repaid $500 of the loan from Rocasah, but failed to repay the $500 outstanding balance. One month later, Rocasah mailed him a letter and a $1,000 check saying the money was a "token of sincere appreciation for standing by me and turning a deaf ear to all the voices of discontentment with me."

Rocasah explained she offered the gift partially to thank Hilson for his support during her resignation. Hilson accepted the gift, deposting the $1,000 check into a personal bank account.

Rocasah was indicted on larceny charges.

The commission found no evidence Hilson ever attempted to interfere with the investigation or advocate lenient treatment for Rocasah. But under state law, a public official is forbidden from accepting a gift from a person he is in a position to benefit.

"By accepting a $1,000 gift from a criminal suspect being investigated by his police department when he was in a position to terminate that investigation, Mr. Hilson violated [that law]," the commission said.

Students from China fear the journey home

By GEORGE ZHU
Collegian Correspondent

For many Chinese students at the University, they are afraid to go home.

"China's human rights situation continues to worsen," said Zhengrong Zhu, a Ph.D. candidate in Food Science, who was actively involved in the 1989 pro-democracy movement.

"No matter how wonderful the official propaganda sounds, there is still no freedom of expression in China today," Zhu said. "People are being arrested by the Chinese government for political reasons.

"Just a couple of weeks ago, the government 'house arrested' a Chinese student who returned home only to see his mother," he said. "This is just a latest example of China's human rights abuses."

Shen Tong, a Boston University student and a leader of the Chinese democracy movement, was detained by police in early September in Beijing after he went back. He has not been released to date.

Yiguang Qiu, who is about to receive his doctor degree in Resource Economics, said he doesn't know when he can return to China without any fear.

"There are many 'invisible' rules and restrictions imposed by Chinese authorities that people have to comply with," Qiu said. "If not careful, you would have a lot of troubles with your job, promotion and everything."

Currently, over three hundred Chinese graduate students are studying at the University, many of whom "fear to go home because of the continuing political prosecutions taking place in China", according to Tong Shen, who headed the Chinese Students and Scholars Association at the University two years ago.

On Capitol Hill, a bill was recently passed to protect Chinese students and scholars in the United Campus bike thefts increasing

Police report recent epidemic of stolen bicycles

By MICHAEL DAY
Collegian Correspondent

The epidemic of stolen bicycles on campus has put the campus Department of Public Safety on alert, according to University police.

Last month police received 22 reports of stolen bicycles with a total value of $8,595. University police received between 50 and 60 reports of bicycles stolen on campus last year.

The types of bicycles stolen have been the top models of mountain bikes on the market today, ranging in prices from $100 to $800. This has led police to investigate the prospect of a bicycle theft ring.

"We are not ruling out the possibility of two or three individuals operating in these thefts," said Detective Richard Besse, crime prevention officer.

Yet police have not been able to pursue any leads because students have been too careless to lock their bicycles.

The police department is attacking back through bicycle registration and bike owner education, according to Besse.

"Students should come in and have their bicycles registered and engraved as soon as they can," Besse said.

Last Tuesday, University Police were conducting bicycle registration for students and faculty alike outside of the Student Union.

Officer Neil Lunney, who supervised the registration, said close to 300 people registered their bicycles between 9 a.m. and 3 p.m.

"When you register your bike, we enter the information you give us into the [police] computer, so that we can quickly call that information up if we need to do so," Lunney said.

According to Lunney and Besse, students who missed the registration period can take their bicycles to the University Police station.

On the registration form, the student is asked to provide the specifics about the bicycle such as the serial number, brand name, color, model name, etc. The student is also asked to engrave their bicycle with their name, social security number and any other information they wish to include. The police provide an engraving tool to the students at the time of registration.

"The most effective way to combat this type of crime is to educate people as to the best ways to secure their bikes," Lunney said.

Security officials are now attempting to schedule meetings with Residence Hall Directors and Assistants to teach them the best way to insure against bike thefts. It is now generally accepted that the U-Lock, or Kryptonite lock is the best type of lock to use for a bicycle.

"I wouldn't recommend any other type of lock to my customers besides the real Kryptonite lock," said Tom Boldway, manager of Bicycle World Too in Amherst Center. "I tell my customers that even imitation Kryptonite locks are not tough to beat. I mean, would you rather pay $30 for a lock or $300 for a new bike?"

But these locks are not impregnable, according to

Officer found guilty of murder

By CHRIS TORCHIA
Associated Press

BOSTON — A former Boston policeman was convicted Monday for the fatal shooting of an unarmed Dorchester teen-ager and was sentenced to 5 1/2 to 10 years in prison.

James E. "Sonny" Hall, 29, who had been charged with second-degree murder, was found guilty on the lesser charge of involuntary manslaughter in Suffolk County Superior Court.

Prosecutors had accused Hall in the July 12, 1991 slaying of Christopher Rogers, 16, who was shot once in the chest as he hid under a truck outside his Hamilton Street home.

"There's not a day goes by that I do not feel the pain of my murdered son," said Judy Rogers, the victim's mother. "His death and my pain was caused by the act of a man who was trained and took an oath to protect and not to kill people like my son.

"He didn't just take my son from me, he took part of my life from me, something that I had," she sobbed.

Hall said the gun fired accidentally when he lost his balance. He was on duty but outside of his assigned district at the time.

Judge Robert Banks said Hall will be eligible for parole after serving one-third of his sentence.

Prosecutor Thomas Mundy, who had recommended that Hall serve a sentence of 14 to 18 years out of a possible maximum of 20 years, said Hall was a "bad apple" who violated the public trust.

"It might give assurance to the public that everybody, including the police, are prosecuted for misdeeds," Mundy said.

Frank McGee, Hall's lawyer, had asked for a suspended sentence and said he would appeal the conviction.

"If we've reached the stage of having jurors second-guess police officers as to when they should put their finger on the trigger, then we've got serious problems," said Frank McGee, Hall's attorney.

"Working on the street as a police officer is a judgement call. It's not something where you go by some dictionary or textbook. Every situation is different."

McGee suggested the jury was not qualified to consider the case because the 12 jurors did not know enough about police work. The jury deliberated for about 15 hours Friday, Saturday and Monday morning.

Prosecutors said Rogers and two teen-aged friends were looking into an apparently stolen van when Hall approached them in his cruiser. Two of the youths fled and Rogers dove beneath a car.

Hall earlier was fired from the police force in connection with an unrelated beating incident. He did not take the stand in his own defense.

You can kill someone's child an just walk away," said Jenel Manor, Roger's cousin.

Hall, she said, "is not going to be able to walk the streets, he's not going to be able to smile, snicker at the younger kids."

States by allowing them to stay in this country unless China's human rights situation is significantly improved.

"I really wishes to go back to my homeland where many of my relatives and friends live," Zhu said. "But the cruel political reality in the communist China leaves me with no choice."

Zhu said he believed the Chinese authorities are well aware of his activities during the democracy movement.

"They keep good track of everything we do on or off the campus, and they have been openly harassing us through various channels," he said.

The Gorton Chinese Student Protection Act, introduced by Sen. Slade Gorton (R-WA) and co-sponsored by Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-MA), is awaiting for President Bush's signature in the White House.

Shijin Wang, former president of the Chinese student organization on the campus, hopes all concerned Chinese students as well as American friends to call the President for his support of the Chinese student protection bill. The telephone number of President George Bush is (202) 456-1111, and fax number is (202) 456-2461.

President Bush has yet to decide whether to sign the legislation into law by the Oct. 12 deadline.

SGA set for election day excitement

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

By the end of today the Student Government Association's election results for Student Senate seats, area government and house council offices will be finalized.

"If students want to have a say in who will be representing their voice campus wide, then I strongly encourage them to vote," said Jon Aronson, chair of governmental affairs.

Aronson said the SGA received the normal number of nomination papers from students running for Student Senate seats and area and house council offices even though there are still a few open seats and offices remaining.

"Postponing the elections to today really helped increase the number of students who filed nomination papers because they had more time to settle in," said Aronson, a junior political science major.

Mike Poster, student senator and vice president of commuter area government, said student interest in the SGA was slow at first, but in the end he was pleased with the turnout.

"Students seem ready to get involved and become active in the SGA, so they can help other students," said Poster, a senior political science major.

Poster said there was a significant increase in the number of students of color, who filed nomination papers. "There were only one or two Black people on the ballot last year and this year there are at least a dozen if not more."

Poster said it is important for every student's voice to be heard and that the SGA be aware of the issues that are particular to every community. "The SGA represents all students no matter what their concerns are or who their concerns are with," he said.

According to Poster, the prime job of the SGA is to advocate students rights. "The SGA has to make their

Apple Festival raises $10,000

Festival to benefit family center attracts thousands

By LYNN YAFFEE
Collegian Correspondent

The 6th Annual Apple Harvest and Crafts Festival raised nearly $10,000 for the Amherst Family Center.

The Festival was held Saturday on the Amherst Town Common

Families, children and students had the opportunity to enjoy many attractions such as crafts demonstrations, games, live entertainment, food, pumpkin decorating, fortune telling and face painting.

"I've never seen such a cacophony of creative crafts," said Matthew Wenz, a University sophomore. Over 200 volunteers made up of local residents and students participated in this year's fair.

"I couldn't have asked for a better day," said Marie Hartwell-Walker, festival chairperson and president of the Board for the Amherst Family Center. "It was a wonderful turn out. And, all the volunteers have been terrific!"

The Amherst Family center is an organization located at the North Congregational Church Parish Hall in North Amherst. The center provides education, support and a sense of community to families with preschool children.

Atkins Fruit Bowl, an Apple Orchard Country Food Store located in South Amherst, was the main sponser. The Atkins food stand was filled with apple pies, apple cider donuts and German Apple Cake.

Pauline Lannon, who has been working for Atkins for 30 years, said "that sales seemed to be very brisk this year, better than they have been in years."

Crafts were a major part of the fair. Over 130 people exhibited and sold various items, including paintings, wood carved figures, handmade dolls, pottery, silk scarves, jewelry, quilts, and kaleidoscopes.

One of the craft vendors, Mary Gannon, a University graduate student, was selling handmade silk screen tee-shirts, along with various imported jewelry from Mexico.

"This fair is really nice," Gannon said. "It is very well rounded and the festival really takes care of their vendors."

Dale Atkins, a Belchertown resident, was pleased with the sales of his wooden carved good luck necklaces called "Tikis and Trolls."

"I don't know if is was the weather or the improvement in the economy, but sales were 20 to 25 percent better than last year," Atkins said.

David Feren, a junior English major at Amherst College, helped out with the children's games.

"The fair is pretty popular and everyone seems to be having a good time," Feren said.

Traci Stokes, a University senior classics major, has participated for two years in the fair with her sorority sisters from Chi Omega.

"We have over 20 girls here helping out with food and crafts," Stokes said. "I think this festival is a great idea for the kids and the families."

Hatch hub of campus

Legendary center for food and music

By DAVID LaFONTANA
Collegian Correspondent

Back when UMass was the home of the Redmen, the Hatchet and Pipe cafeteria was opened in the Student Union.

The mascot was changed to the Minutemen in 1972, after complaints from Native American groups, and the cafeteria became the Hatch. Larry Jeffers arrived two years later and took over as manager.

Since then Jeffers, acquiring the nickname "Mr. Hatch", has increased the hours, expanded the menu and made the Hatch something of an institution on campus.

"We opened the bar again after we had requests from students," Jeffers said. "Before the drinking age was changed, the Hatch and Bluewall would go through 150 barrels of beer a week!"

Lines for the Hatch would run all the way to the information desk by the University Store to drink and hear the bands play.

The Hatch is one of only two places on campus with a full bar, and it is well known as a showcase for new bands.

"When the Bluewall closed, there was no place for new bands. We had enough room, so local bands would play for free, just for the exposure," Jeffers said.

Jeffers has seen acts like Bonnie Raitt, James Taylor, Max Roach, Fred Tillis and legendary jazz pianist Sammy Price play the Hatch.

"Two weeks before he died, Price played the Hatch," Jeffers said.

In 1982 Jeffers took part in a ribbon-cutting ceremony to re-open the Hatch with a new layout. The new Hatch includes music and comedians. Jeffers has expanded the menu to Mexican food, cold cuts and pizza.

Today Jeff Holmes' Big Band plays every Monday and the Hatch is still a showcase for new bands. The bands know how much exposure they can get.

"They still play for free," said Jeffers with a smile.

Professor speaks about college women's goals

By LISA M. TETRAULT
Collegian Correspondent

"Women want it all — marriage, motherhood and careers," according to Michele Hoffnung, a professor at Quinnipiac College.

Hoffnung spoke Tuesday evening at Mt. Holyoke College for the Five-College Women's Studies Research Center.

In her lecture "College Women's Expectations for Work and Family," Hoffnung focused on college women's plans for work and family, and how they've changed over the years.

Citing previous studies, Hoffnung said the goals for women have changed. In a study of Barnard College freshmen in 1943, 61 percent planned to concentrate on family and home. By 1979, that number had decreased to five percent.

Statistics from a New York college study say that in 1970, 48 percent of freshmen planned to combine work and family. In the mid-seventies, that number rose to 85 percent, and by 1985, 98 percent.

Although women's goals have drastically changed, society's views on women have not changed that much, Hoffnung said.

"It is labeled nontraditional, sometimes even feminist, for women to want to combine work and family," she said. "The label of nontraditionalist or feminist on women's desire to have a career is a little bit simplistic.

"Few questions are asked about the women's view of families," Hoffnung said. "Yet, everyone's views of families are different."

Attitudes about women in general differ from views they hold for themselves, she said.

"It's a rare college student, certainly college woman and even a college man, who would tell you that women shouldn't be able to do anything that men can do," she said. "But that's not the same thing as a woman saying 'I'm going to do it.'"

Hoffnung, chair of the Women's Studies Program at Quinnipiac College, is also conducting research on the psychological effects of motherhood on women.

According to her research, there is a high number of college women saying they plan to combine work and family. But many real mothers experience confusion and conflict. There are several factors which contribute to this, Hoffnung said:

"It is labeled nontraditional for women to want to combine work and family."

Michele Hoffnung
Quinnipiac College professor

• The general social devaluation of being "just a homemaker." Society doesn't see this as a real job.

• Lack of understanding on the part of society of the pressures to seek employment while children are young.

• Part-time jobs have not increased in availability, she said. Many women would prefer to work part-time.

Hoffnung, author of "What's a Mother to Do," said today's mothers at home are concerned with when they can go back to work. For some of them, they question whether they will be able to work after putting their professions on hold for several years.

Hoffnung also states that men and women view children differently. Many women plan to work but will work around their schedules to allow time to care for their children.

"Liberal female undergraduates do not see children free by choice as a positive option. They project children as enhancing quality of life for both themselves and their partners," she said. "In contrast, male students project children as lowering life's expectations."

The lecture was the second in an eight part series being held at Mount Holyoke through the Research Associates 1992-1993 Fall Colloquia series.

Students feel soured by Food Services

Food services are becoming a problem within the Campus Center and Student Union, according to the Board of Governors (BOG) at a meeting last Thursday.

The Board of Governors, a student group who oversees all Campus Center and Student Union issues, said the sad state of these services can easily be influenced by students who are willing to get involved and do something about the situation.

Cafeteria food prices are too high, according to Ben Preston, chairman of the Board of Governors. Off campus delicatessens provide more discounts and services for students than the cafeteria.

"Students should get on top of food services in the buildings," Preston said.

Students should become more actively involved and vocalize their ideas and suggestions to improve the food services program.

Although the Top of the Campus Restaurant announced at the beginning of this semester it was no longer allowing students to receive a 15 percent discount, the BOG was able to get the 15 percent discount back.

The Vending Program on the concourse is experiencing problems with authorization, according to Preston. The BOG is hoping students get involved with the vending policy. After it is reviewed, the issue will be voted on and revised.

Detective Besse. "Sometimes students will leave the key mechanism on the lock facing up, granting the bike thief easy access to damaging or picking to lock," Besse said.

This enables the thief to apply leverage in the attempt to crush the lock. When using any type of lock, the key mechanism should be facing down, the lock should be as snug to the bike as possible, and the lock should not be too close to the ground, according to Besse.

If possible, the bike seat should be taken with the student, and the front wheel should be removed and locked together with the rear wheel and the body of the bicycle. According to Boldway, "close to 25 percent of our bike sales are bought to replace a stolen bike."

Another reason for the rise in thefts is the location of the locked bicycles. "The bike should not be locked to a tree or a fence because it is easily to cut [the bike] away from these places," Besse said.

But the lack of bike racks in key areas have forced students to become creative with the places they are able to lock their bikes, according to police officials.

Officer Lunney has started a petition among the students asking for more racks.

"The students have been very enthusiastic about this petition. The areas they are complaining about the most are the Dining Commons', the Main Library, and most of the classroom buildings," Lunney said. "Most of the thefts occur at night, and the bikes are stolen a lot easier when they are locked in dark places."

In their effort to combat the rise in bike thefts, Public Safety has now instructed its officers to include sweeps of bike racks in their normal beats.

"Right now, these bike thieves are getting as sophisticated as car thieves, and we have to try to keep up with them as best as we can," Lunney said.

While the investigation continues, Detective Besse warns students: "Try not to give a thief an easy target."

And, Officer Lunney said, "We really have to improve the awareness of this type of theft."

"He alone commands the respect of all the parties involved," said Mangaliso. "If there is one thing that they all agree upon, it is their respect for Bishop Tutu."

Mangaliso also expressed his own sense of optimism towards the successful arrival of Archbishop Tutu. According to him, an attempt was made in February, 1991 to feature Archbishop Tutu as speaker during the annual Black History events held at UMass. That visit, however, was cancelled due to a schedule conflict.

"I feel victory," said Mangaliso. "Seeing him walk out of that plane helped me to accept the reality that he is finally here."

Preparation for Tutu's visit have been underway from several months now and stem in part from efforts by Mangaliso to establish an exchange program between UMass and Fort Hare University in South Africa.

Proceeds from tonight's lecture will benefit the Bishop Tutu Fund, which is a scholarship program designed to fund the higher education for Black South Africans to study abroad.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers or cartoonists and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

Racist attack condemned

The front page of Monday's Collegian served as yet another reminder that racism isn't just something you read about. It happens, here.

The front page illustrated racist graffiti on the 17th floor of Washington tower. The accompanying story recounted how the resident assistant on the floor, who is Black, was assaulted last week by White students while confronting them over violations of the alcohol policy.

Apparently, someone felt they hadn't finished what they started last week and felt compelled to destroy the 17th floor. The results were horrifying: racial slurs written on walls, bulletin boards torn down, even human feces smeared on the rug in the hall.

The Collegian condemns these actions for what they are: cowardly, racist, hateful crimes committed without any regard for human dignity or the residents of Washington's 17th floor.

It's bad enough that a person or persons felt so much hate that they would attack an RA and his floor on the grounds of race. What's worse, they couldn't even confront him face-to-face. It was a gutless attack. Instead, they took the easy way out and wrote on the walls when no one was looking. Is this how far we've come? Or is this how low we've stooped?

Secondly, the Collegian expresses concern at Housing policies which force resident assistants to act like police. The RA in question was first attacked because he was enforcing the Alcohol Policy.

This is the thanks he gets? His floor destroyed and his dignity stepped on by cowards who resented the fact that he asked them to pour their drinks out?

RAs are students, not police, and should not be expected to perform the job of police. That's up to the University. Unless Housing is willing to adequately protect its employees, it should not expect them to put their lives in danger.

The Collegian expects the University will pursue prosecution of those guilty of these crimes. Platitudes and promises mean nothing without actions to back them up. If ever there was a time for the University not to pass the buck, this is it.

The Collegian also asks students to remember the following: we are all human beings and deserve each other's respect. It's the least we can do.

Presidential honor is dead

David RIVERA

Go back a few years, and think real hard. Can you remember the first time someone asked, "What do you want to be when you grow up?" When was it? Where? And who asked it?

It was my first day in kindergarten. My first teacher asked my very first school question. Actually, Mrs. Schneider asked all of us rookies our hopes of the future.

I can remember Brian McWilliams wanted to be a police officer, as did a few of the other kids. Maggie Lawrence wanted to be a doctor. Vance Chisholm wanted to be a baseball star, even though he couldn't hit his way out of a paper bag. Brenda Joyce wanted to be a civil engineer, like her father. I don't think at the time she knew what it was, but she wanted to be one anyway.

I had far higher aspirations. I wanted to be none other than — the President of the United States. Mrs. Schneider was so pleased, I received an extra cookie at snack time. Here I was at age five and, call it graft if you like, but already I was reaping the benefits of my presidential future.

As a kid I thought that being president was not only an important job but also the most honorable job an American could have. Impressions I learned of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln led me to believe that the position of president was reserved for extraordinary human beings.

Hadn't I seen the president almost every night in the news and seen his name almost every morning in the newspaper? Didn't I hear my parents talk about him at the dinner table, and hadn't I learned — most important of all — that the president was a caring person who never, ever, lied?

Of course these were my impressions as a child; gullible as they were, I held onto them. First grade, far more sophisticated than kindergarten, seemed cynical of my quest for public service. "Sure, go ahead and be a crook!" exclaimed Brian McWilliams. "When I'm a cop, I'll bust ya."

I disregarded this minor setback in my drive for the White House and stuck to my goals even into the second grade.

Saying the second grade reaction was hostile would be an understatement: I was flat-out booed. But even I had seen the reasons for their hostility. Politics and politicians were not as honorable as we were told to believe. Yes, the president was on the television every night and in the morning papers, but mostly because of negative allegations.

In the early 1970s, Watergate set the trend eventually leading to the Iran/Contra scandal of the 1980s. The presidential deceptions during Grenada, Panama and the Gulf War were all events in our near history proving that "presidential honor" is dead. The dishonor reaches into the current campaign.

Mr. Bush's aides have admitted to using "distorted information" against Governor Clinton, claiming that "it works." Disgraceful. The hypocrisy that reigns in Washington is so stagnant, it engulfs everyone and anyone, including us. We allow the lies and distortions that discredit and corrupt the the very core of our "democracy."

Looking back, I don't know how I could expect the leader of our country to hold to such high ideals as truth and honor. How could I — how dare I — hope that the president would hold himself accountable for his mistakes?

How dare I think that presidents should never lie. We know that they have. We know that they do. And I can guarantee you, they will.

Spilt milk leaves dignity dampened

Kris K. EARLE

Something highly embarrassing happened to me on the afternoon of September 16th, anno domini, 1992.

I shall begin at the beginning. I had just finished my first class of the day and was coming from a quick stop at the Mather Career Tent (you know, the place where you get all kinds of forms and spend an hour filling them out only to discover that you still have little to no chances of finding a job). I decided that since my stomach was making odd noises, it would be best to take a lunch break. I had two hours until my next class — not enough time to go to the apartment and whip up a tuna melt and a Coke. I decided on the closest alternative: I went to Franklin Dining Commons.

Now before you gentle readers get all bent out of shape by thinking that this is another cheap whining about D.C. food: do not worry. It isn't, it is not, nowhere near and it is amusing. Please bear with me.

Upon entering the fine establishment which is the Franklin D.C., I paid my hard-earned $4.95, equipped myself with a tray, and zoomed on down the loading line. Filling my tray with all kinds of delectable goodies, I stumbled upon the soup.

"What kind of soup is that?" I asked a cheery silver-haired woman.

"Oh, I don't know," she replied. "Try it, and come back and tell me what it is."

So I did. It tasted sort of like cream of washroom. But this is not the amusing part, and I am starting to digress from my main anecdote.

I finally make it to my seat. I have already gone through getting up at least three more times for silverware, drinks, condiments, and what have you. I am ready to eat.

As the clock struck 12:17 p.m., the accident happened.

While reading the paper, I nonchalantly reached over to grab my ham on a water crest roll. To my horror, I grabbed the wrong item. A very full and very cold glass of milk was held for about two seconds before eluding my grasp and moving on elsewhere.

Cold milk dampened my inner thighs.

The next moments were spent trying to blot some of the liquid numbing my gonads. The attempt failed. It was like trying to drink a bathtub full of water through a coffee stirrer; it's possible, but it would have taken an eternity. My class was in half an hour.

As I got my wet self up, a squishy, sticky sound emerged from below. It sort of sounded like when somebody slaps you in the face with a handful of chocolate pudding. This sound was amusing to the patrons nearby.

My bold attempts to cover myself, alternating a newspaper and my backpack, also failed miserably. I stopped by a few more restrooms on my way to class, hoping to find one of those hot-air machines. I didn't. I guess that was a plus for me, since if anyone walked in the men's room, it would have looked quite odd to see a young man with a wet lap pointed toward the heater. If one is not sure, one assumes bladder troubles.

Moving along, amongst all the eyeballs I felt digging into my back, I made it to class. I was even early, so I began to ponder the events which happened in my luncheon hour.

I had stolen a few napkins and a knife that day, right before I began to cry over the spilt milk. It may not have been a federal offense, but I know it was wrong. Perhaps, I thought (and this is where it gets a bit odd), perhaps my subconscious was striving to tell me that stealing a few utensils had to be justified somehow. And, with my mind in a fury, it caused my hand to slip and create an embarrassing situation. It was a possibility, however strange.

Then again, I am probably just some poor klutz who poured milk on his crotch.

'Artists' are asked to pick up after themselves

Once upon a time, last Monday, I was canoeing on the Campus Pond. In the middle of the pond was an ugly collection of boards, nailed together, tied to a white plastic barrel. If you've walked across campus in the last few weeks then you've probably seen it.

At first I thought maybe some "artist" was kind enough to unleash some more of their work onto the general public, maybe a follow-up to the piece that debuted last spring, now seen washed up in the bushes and scum at the north end of the pond. But on closer investigation, the truth became clear. A fraternity, namely Alpha Epsilon Pi, decided to publicize their rush week by putting a board with their name on it face down into the mud on the pond bottom. We decided that to help them in their publicity attempts, we would risk the toxic sludge of the pond and haul it to the shore where it could be read and possibly taken back to their front yard, where it belonged. Last I checked, it's still there.

Perhaps the brothers should do a bit more of their fabled community service and take away their trash instead of leaving it on our pond. And while they're at it, they could remove the styrofoam art eyesore as well. After all, the swan doesn't need any competition; it's got a big enough attitude problem already.

Church of Christ wrongly accused

I am writing in response to Diana D'Avanzo's editorial [Collegian, Oct. 1], "Boston Church of Christ teaches false doctrine." I never thought I would be defending the Church of Christ; I lost the love of my life to this church. However, I have had some interaction with the church and its members, and what you said about them is not only incorrect but a poor attempt at making them look bad. You ask, "Is it a Christian church or a cult?" I ask myself this everyday, never finding an answer. Regardless, what does examining their "doctrine of salvation" have to do with answering that question?

You seem to think that they water baptize their members before salvation whch makes their doctrine false because "salvation is essential for (and thus precedes) water baptism." The latter of this is true, and substantiated in the gospel. As is that "it is the gospel that saves those who believe in it. . . [and when you] 'confess with your mouth "Jesus is Lord" and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved.'" You must then be assuming that these people don't live by the scripture, aren't saved and therefore the water baptism is made invalid.

That is where you are incorrect. The love of my life picked up his Bible after attending a Bible discussion with some church members and hasn't put it down since. He, and the other members of the Church of Christ, DO live by the gospel and preach from it on a regular basis. This church will not baptize you until you have accepted Jesus as Savior and have begun to live in an "upright" manner.

"Saving baptism" and water baptism is a two-part process, not alternates. Saving baptism comes first by accepting the gospel and Jesus. You are water baptized for further purification. You imply that members of the Church of Christ don't follow this and they aren't saved. But as I have demonstrated, they are saved. They believe in the scripture and in Jesus, and are entitled to water baptism.

It seems to me that your problem is not with their doctrine of salvation, but something else. As I stated previously, I never expected to rise to the defense of the Church of Christ. However, I cannot stand to see them wrongly analyzed and accused. It only empowers them. I would suggest you interact with the members of the Church of Chris and study their ways before making any further judgments.

Multicultural Affairs

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers or cartoonists and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

Multiculturalism: Where's the commitment?

"Our efforts to achieve a truly multicultural, vibrant community must continue; we must find new ways to serve those communities formerly served by Upward Bound; we must continue to support those who are working to free our campus from the ugliness that comes from racist, sexist, anti-Semitic, homophobic and other intolerant attitudes and actions."

— Chancellor Richard O'Brien, October 2, 1992.

We, women of color, share and are committed to the Chancellor's ideas to truly free our campus from actions brought about by racist and sexist attitudes.

Cara Lee
BIRCH

So far, we have noticed that the administration has not lived up to their statements to create a multicultural university nor have we found it to be a safe place where such diversity can flourish. Their actions speak clearly: Upward Bound has just been eliminated, and programs that serve women of color have also been cut.

On the other hand, they have attempted to address students of color by increasing funding for the cultural centers and they have committed to hiring ten minority faculty through the Special Opportunity Fund lines. It must be noted that in these cases, however, these actions taken by the administration was only brought about through student protest and positive activism.

"Women of color in particular are the most economically disadvantaged in this society. Just looking at the demographics of UMass indicates the extent of the problem."

THE PROBLEM:

Throughout the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, battering has increased dramatically. Last year, a woman was killed every 16 days by her boyfriend or husband. In contrast, a woman has been killed every 9 days so far this year. Since the early 1970s, battered women's shelters have increased threefold in this state as a reaction to the increase in violence against women.

While some legislators are contending that an increase in funding for the shelters is the only solution to combatting violence, when one checks the facts, it becomes clear that this measure is simply band-aid work.

As women of color, we contend that a more effective solution is to provide women the opportunity to permanently escape the constant violence. Rather than having places to run away to only temporarily, women must have an avenue in which they can get on with their lives by being economically stable, have child care, health care, housing, and access to education.

Women of color in particular are the most economically disadvantaged in this society. Just looking at the demographics of UMass indicates the extent of the problem. The University has failed to actively recruit women of color and the increase in tuition makes it all the more difficult for them to gain the access to higher education.

"UMass is a land-grant institution and therefore must not only cater to the needs of the students but also to the surrounding communities."

The few of us who are at UMass are not only isolated from each other, but have no services that address the amount of violence and harassment we face. The Everywoman's Center does not have any programs that serve women of color. Furthermore, the professional staff that constitute the EWC only speak English and are overwhelmingly white.

How do they expect to service ALL women when they cannot even relate to us culturally? Why do they contradict their mission statement that purports to cater to a diverse population of women? Where do women of color go when faced with the high level of sexual and racial discrimination, harassment, and violence?

Are cultural centers the answer? Apparently not, as they never address violence against women of color, but instead put on fashion shows, cultural dinners, and dances that buy into the "multicultural" facade that the university extols.

And what of the "Women's Studies" department? Where is their "feminist" commitment for the liberation of all women? The majority of the core classes do not teach our own histories or our struggles of resistance as women of color. Their theories tokenize women of color as objects of study without any serious commitment to understanding our position in this world.

Without this commitment, they will ultimately fail in their attempt to achieve women's equality.

"The link between theory and practice has been much discussed in higher education, but so far, students and faculty have not had the avenues to truly expand their academic experience."

PROPOSED SOLUTIONS:

In order for women to escape violence on a permanent basis the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the University should commit to increasing access to higher education for women of color.

This would entail providing full scholarships, including housing and child care, for low-income women of color. While this not only benefits women from diverse backgrounds, it also creates an atmosphere of progressive change this university is so dedicated to.

UMass is a land-grant institution and therefore must not only cater to the needs of the students but also to the surrounding communities. At this point, UMass does not have a strong structural base from which to work. A new program, then, must be considered, utilizing the diverse resources of the University.

Traditionally, academic programs have been divorced from the communities of people they purport to "study." The link between theory and practice has been much discussed in higher education, but so far, students and faculty have not had the avenues to truly expand their academic experience.

Furthermore, servicing the surrounding community is one of the primary goals of any land-grant institution. Why not attempt to address both the academic community and the surrounding community in one simple program?

If, for instance, scholarships for low-income women of color were to be established on a permanent basis, it will change the lives of women of color in a positive and permanent way. The demographics of the University will improve, isolation for women of color on campus will decrease and diversity for the academic community and the student body will increase.

Secondly, if there is an increase in the diversity of the student body, then the curriculum and faculty must reflect this diversity. The University has already begun this process by the recruitment of more minority faculty.

Also, there are several departments on this campus which encourage their students to take part in internships and co-ops, in order to gain practical experience by working with people in the surrounding communities. Women's Studies might be one such department that could pursue their initial mission, which is to create a program that is multicultural and to directly connect with the communities that students come from. The University has the resources to create such changes. All that needs to be done is to implement existing resources in a concrete way.

Finally, the way to combat the crisis of violence against women of color in the state, the way to create a "multicultural, vibrant community," the way to "continue to support those who are working to free our campus from the ugliness that comes from racist [and] sexist. . .attitudes and actions," and the way the intellectual community can improve their work, is the creation of a new program.

"The University should commit to increasing access to higher education for women of color."

Administration and the state can work to create accessibility to higher education through scholarships for low-income women of color. Active recruitment of minority faculty, particularly women would be key in establishing a strong, diverse base that the university could greatly benefit from.

Because women of color, as students, as community members, are in particular need of the resources this university can give, then the Special Opportunity Fund lines can greatly enhance departments such as Women's Studies. Also, a program that brings together it's students to link theory and practice expands the intellectual base, which higher education constantly pursues. After all, isn't education all about giving back to the people and improving society at large?

Stop the war against the Black Community

By SHYAMALA IVATURY
Collegian Correspondent

On Wednesday, Oct.7, at 7:30 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge, a selected panel will discuss the war against the Black community waged by the United States government.

The panel consists of three activists, Mshindi Shabazz, Kentake Nzapa, and Alison Hoehne.

"They will discuss the connection between the 500 years of genocide against Indigenous peoples and the oppression of African-Americans," Jen Canon, organizer of the event, stated.

Nzapa will speak on behalf of the National People's Democratic Uhuru Movement, which stands for Black self-determination, Black pride, and Black power. The Uhuru Movement fights for the right to decent housing, healthcare, education, and democratic rights for Black communities.

Shabazz is a representative from the African People's Socialist Party, which is an umbrella organization that works to free political prisoners, such as Fred Hampton Jr., in the United States.

Hoehne is a member of the African People's Solidarity Committee, which is predominantly White. They contend that "White people cannot organize against racism in isolation and must work in coalition with and under the leadership of Black people."

The main function of the party is to educate the White community about their responsibility in colonization of Indigeneous and Black people.

The Uhuru Movement is along the same lines as the Black Panther Party and the Black Power Movement of the 60s.

"We are building a movement for white reparations to the black community, reversing the flow of 500 years of stolen labor and resources, and to build concrete and material support for the black self-determination programs of the Uhuru Movement nationally," quoted from the mission statement of the group.

"Everyone is encouraged to hear and participate in this open forum," Canon urges.

'Lining Bar Gang' brings railroad history alive

By PATRICIA ROY
Collegian Correspondent

The Lining Bar Gang re-enacts the history of railroad cadence songs during a performance on October 2.
CHRISTOPHER EVANS / COLLEGIAN

Friday afternoon behind New Africa House, a railroad emerged from the hands and voices of the sixteen-member "Lining Bar Gang". The gang's performance was part of an event/exhibit at New Africa House aimed at bridging the histories of Northern and Southern African-Americans.

The two-part performance consisted of the worksongs of Southern black railroad workers and African-American folktales from storyteller, Dylan Pritchett. Spectators gathered on the grass and were treated and educated with humor and history.

The Lining Bar Gang, dressed in blue overalls and railroad cap, reenacted the now mechanized process of rail realignment, spikes, hammers and all. All equipment and materials used were in the fashion of those used during the years of railroad expansion.

The performance involved a demonstration of the cadencies used by railway workers. These cadencies became an important part of the work as the group's manager, Mr. White, explained. Several men were needed to properly align the track and each pound needed to be exerted by each man at the same exact moment.

The cadence aided coordination and served to humor the men as they sweat and ached their way through each long day. With a smile, Mr. White told the audience that most of the worksongs were about women.

The differnt cadencies yeilded many memorable lines, such as "I gotta girl from Baltimore/ she used to love me, don't no more," and "I gotta girl in Kansas City/ She can't cook but she sure is pretty."

Most men spent their lives on the bottom level of railway construction, which offered little upward mobility. The men often trained their future foremen. Bosses along with women, became the subject of worksongs. Lines such as "Bossman drink a bottle of gin/ Now he can't tell where's he been" and "My captain treats me mean/ Don't give me time to eat my beans" represented typical views of the bossman's position.

Most of the members of the Lining Bar were descendents of railway workers and some had spent many years themselves working the tracks. When railroad construction was in its heyday, a man could spend thirty to fifty years working at the same job. The work was hard and required coordination skill as the cadencies suggest.

Storyteller Dylan Pritchett followed the Lining Bar Gang's performance with humor and music. His two folktales wove proverb with wit. One such proverb reads, "He who asks the question cannot avoid the answer."

The moral came after a tale of famine and a man who seeks a magic drum that will yield food and make him popular. The old man disobeys the wise old woman and causes the death of his village.

Though the stories use traditional African archetypes such as famine/drought and the wise woman, a modern audience can still find relevance, for the stories speak of timeless truths about vanity, jealousy, greed, and love.

The second story is appropriate for our times in that it deals with love, ignorance and hateful prejudice. A young girl falls in love with a fish (yeah, a fish) who gives her fresh water for her family. The father and brothers discover the shall we say, bi-cultural marriage and kill the fish. In spite of this, the lovely girl bears many (water-lily) children of her beloved.

Mr. Pritchett involved the crowd with his demonstration of African music. Clapping our hands, we experienced the rhythm and tonality of African music. At the end of his performance, Dylan Pritchett explained the importance of African storytelling and music: "If we forget these things, they will die".

These things will not be forgotten, at least on this campus, if students and faculty visit the Augusta Savage Gallery and encourage events such as the Lining Bar Gang to return to the area.

Buffalo Tom rocks UMass

Buffalo Tom
Student Union Ballroom
Friday, October 2, 1992

Friday was not just another weekend night for the five hundred people who came to see Buffalo Tom. It was a chance to see one of the most inspiring bands around and make friends with fellow sweaty music lovers. Buffalo Tom got to play for their old school, J Mascis wandered through the crowd and everyone went home smiling.

The first opening band Coffee played to the slowly filling ballroom and sounded good for a band that is just starting to mature. Their cover of CSNY's "Ohio" was impressive.

The next opening band Come got the crowd's attention, but most people were reluctant to let themselves go to songs they have never heard before. The only way to hear Come is on compilations until their first album is released in November on Matador Records.

Their set was short, and they played on borrowed equipment, but the performance was enough to get people excited about the band's future.

Lead singer Thalia Zedek lived up to her reputation for eerie charisma and stage presence. She probably had a rough day and she didn't try to hide it with a smiling stage face.

Come didn't just play songs, they shared a part of themselves and it was captivating. They are really noisy, but in every song there was a little beauty that found a way through the feedback.

When I talked to Come's guitarist after the set, his quotable quote was "New record. Get it."

When Buffalo Tom opened with "Birdbrain" the ballroom started to churn like a beaten-up wash machine on spin cycle; it was bound to be a fun evening. They sounded great right from the beginning and their ability to play on people's emotions is even stronger live than on their records. Their songs are beautiful and they did them justice; all three of them poured their hearts out.

The crowd gave back energy, dancing hard, singing along and smiling. "Mosh" is a dirty word at a Buffalo Tom show; people just dance without getting uptight about stepping on toes or bumping into each other. There was no angst, just release — and if felt great.

When Bill Janovitz introduced a song from the first album as "a song we wrote while going to school here," the band and audience grew closer. It was nice to see Buffalo Tom was having fun, too, and they played for a long time. The three song encore didn't seem like an obligation, instead it was the finishing touch to an amazing show.

Buffalo Tom is a band that deserves the attention and it is hard to imagine them not getting huge. They have the important talent of improving with each album and a style that should touch all fans of good music. Their songwriting and passion for playing rivals anyone's, but they don't seem likely to let the rock star life get to their heads; to us they'll always be three UMass guys who keep making people really happy with their music.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): If entertaining this week, be sure to include one or two people who can boost your career. A money-making proposition could be part of the picture. Go slow if romance hits a snag.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Circumstances conspire to bring greater balance to your life. An unconventional person aids you in a personal quest. Refuse to be rushed into making long-range goals.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Do not expect too much from your mate or a close business associate this morning. Cooperation may be in short supply. Talking things over with a friend will give you a whole new perspective.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Someone may try to sell you a bill of goods in connection with a fascinating scheme or investment. Do not buy it. Wishfulthinking could be your undoing. Take things slow in romance.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): a cash shortage or pinch-penny attitude may be the reason for a loved one's long face. Unless you act sympathetic, romance could take a nose dive. Plan a special treat for the weekend.

VIRGO (Aug. 23- Sept. 22): Today brings you a chance to remain quietly in the background and accomplish a lot with hardly any fuss. Close attention to domestic and financial matters will benefit you.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Well-chosen words of commitment will get you further with your steady day than a lot of whispered sweet nothings. Rely on family members, not your co-workers, for emotional support.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Teamwork in connection with property repairs or a business transaction will yield some surprising rewards. People who share your values gain a clearer understanding of your motives.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Only you can decide what is right or wrong for you. Although others may not understand your decision at first, they eventually will come around.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Routine activities prove surprisingly satisfying today. A business trip could prove quite profitable. The evening hours are excellent for romance. Show your tender side.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Concentrate on the promotional and advertising aspects of your work. Your personality is a big plus. You will be even more popular after tonight. Re-examine your intimacy needs.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Concentrate on a "top priority" project in the morning hours. You may run into some delays this afternoon. Open your heart to a trusted friend. A call in the evening will be the wrong number.

The UMass Dining Commons will be serving food to students participating in the meal plan for a good deal of the day today. The D.C.'s will open sometime very early in the morning and stay open for a while. Then they'll close, but not for long because they have to reopen. After a couple hours they'll close again and clean the whole place up again, but just like an hour after that a bunch of people will start lining up and they'll open it again. When the people stop coming, the D.C.'s get closed up for good and a bunch of people who work there shut everything off and straighten the whole place up so it will be ready in the morning.

See tomorrow's Collegian for more about these ongoing D.C. activities.

waukee caught fire and caught Baltimore in mid-September and came within two games of catching Toronto. Cleveland surprised many by winning the battle for fourth place among New York, Boston and Detroit.

The AL West saw Minnesota follow the lead of Toronto, but somehow after injury upon injury, Oakland managed to stay within striking distance. They won the division by doing what every manager tells a second-place team: let's sweep 'em and never look back. Minnesota never recovered after Oakland won 7 of 8 games against them in late July/early August. Chicago got very hot in August, but it was too little, too late.

For the first time since 1986, all four divison leaders are very evenly matched. No team won 100 games, and no team lost more than 70. Pittsburgh and Toronto were probably the most consistent, yet Atlanta and Oakland won their divisions by beating the competition quite convincingly. When it's this close, a friend of mine put it quite well when he said, "You have to go with your gut instinct, rather than your heart or your wallet."

AL: Oakland vs. Toronto

Toronto would be very wise to analyze how Milwaukee was able to sweep Oakland last weekend. Toronto doesn't have Milwaukee's speed, but they do have the hot pitching. Oakland needs to get ahead early and give the game to Russell and Eckersley. Toronto finished the season strong, while Oakland has had time to rest and repair. The call? Toronto in 7 games. Both teams have strong playoff experience, but Toronto's veterans are gamers, they've got home-field advantage, and the team is hot.

NL: Pittsburgh vs. Atlanta

The Pittsburgh Pirates have won the division the last three years, yet there is an attitude among sportswriters that they didn't win the pennant so much as other teams lost it. Atlanta has won nearly 80 of its last 120 games, but has been cool of late after fending off Cincinnati's final charge. Atlanta has incredible starting pitching, but a bullpen full of should-bes and has-beens. Glavine hasn't pitched well for nearly 6 weeks, thus giving Pittsburgh a chance. The call ? Pittsburgh in 6 games.

Red Sox reconstruct for '93:

A look back at a disastrous year and a look ahead

By CALEB COCHRAN
Collegian Correspondent

Before the 1992 baseball season even began, the Boston Red Sox were already having problems. They had lost their first baseman, Carlos Quintana, for the season after he was injured in a car accident. Their new manager, Butch Hobson, was already being labeled as the wrong man for the job. Their franchise pitcher, Roger Clemens, was late for spring training. This season was doomed from the very start.

Things only got worse. Wade Boggs, the league's best hitter for almost a decade, never got into the groove and finished the season at .259. Ellis Burks, the talented centerfielder, went down to a back injury in June. Mike Greenwell was lost for the season after elbow surgery. Phil Plantier, the promising rightfielder, went into a slump and was sent to Pawtucket. The Bosox continued to lose, and finished the season in sole possession of last place in the A.L. East, 23 games out of first.

It is pointless to try and explain away the 1992 season. It's behind us, and the smart thing to do is to forget the season entirely and concentrate on what can now be done to reconstruct the club for next season.

First things first: Jack Clark is a money pit. He does nothing to help the team. He should be the first to go.

The next priority should be the infield. Mo Vaughn will never develop into the great player he was touted to become. Jody Reed wants out. Wade Boggs is no longer productive, and his attitude on and off the field is hurting the team. My advice to Lou Gorman would be to get rid of all these guys. Get what you can for them.

The Sox should at least be able to get some young prospects for Boggs, and a package deal involving Vaughn and Reed could bring a solid player, perhaps a speedy leadoff hitter. The departure of Vaughn, Reed and Boggs would still leave the Sox with Scott Cooper, Tim Naehring, Luis Rivera, John Valentin, and the ever-versatile Steve Lyons. Without even trading for new infielders, the Sox could still get by.

Next is the outfield. The Red Sox have too many outfielders and not enough good outfielders. The starters for 1993 should be Phil Plantier in right, Ellis Burks in center, and Bob Zupcic in left. That means Billy Hatcher, Mike Greenwell, Tom Brunansky, and Herm Winningham are basically the odd guys out. With Clark gone, the Sox will need a DH, a job which Bruno could handle quite well. Winningham can be called upon to pinch hit and play outfield occasionally.

Greenwell and Hatcher are expendable. Hatcher is not the answer to Boston's leadoff dilemma, and Greenwell is already washed up. The Sox should trade these guys for a solid number three starter and a young infielder who can hit well and run well. All of the infield positions are up for grabs, and the Sox would welcome a promising youngster, even one who has not proven his worth yet.

I'm expecting big things from the '93 Sox. A healthy Ellis Burks is a great player, and Phil Plantier will soon blossom into a premier power hitter. Bob Zupcic is solid in the field and at the plate. With these guys hitting 3, 4, and 5 and a couple of new guys to hit 1 and 2, the Sox could improve tremendously on their 73-89 record. Unless they land Barry Bonds or Kirby Puckett, however, first place is still a few years away.

Fencing holds own in Buffalo

By MARK VALUTKEVICH
Collegian Correspondent

Last weekend, September 26 and 27, the University of Massachusetts fencing team travelled up to Buffalo, New York to compete in an international hosted by the University of Buffalo.

It was a rigorous weekend as the team fenced for approximately eight hours a day. More than a dozen teams from around the Northeast and Canada, such as the host school, Rochester fencing club and Brock University of Canada made for some tough competition. Yet through it all, the UMass team showed a very strong performance after having only two weeks of official practice.

On Saturday, the men's team sabre placed fourth. This team was made up of seniors Craig Andrew and Al Houle and junior R.J. Ferullo. On the same day the men's foil team, consisting of Mellisa Santala and Jeff Chu and juniors John Weiss and Mark Valutkevich placed fifth.

The following day, team epee placed third and received the bronze medal. The squad just missed placing second in the last round of the tournament. The medal winners were Edward Roaf and "Epee" Jim Silva and junior James Butrym.

Athlete of the Week: Justin Edelman

COURTESY SPORTS INFORMATION
Midfielder Justin Edelman is the Collegian Athlete of the Week. Edelman, a junior communications major, scored two goals in the Siena game, giving him the team lead in scoring.

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

High expectations, whether they are team-oriented or personal, often lead to disappointments, if they are out of reach. But for junior Justin Edelman, his goals as well as his team's, are well within the grasp of reality.

"Before the season, I wanted to score ten goals, and make the all-conference team with our team being at the A-10's."

Edelman, a midfielder on the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team, scored two goals in the second half against Siena, giving him the team lead in points (15) and goals (six), as well as the Collegian Athlete of the Week.

Soccer players start out very young, and this one is no different. Before high school sports were even a thought, Edelman was out on the field in South Orange, N. J.4

When high school came around, he played three sports for Columbia High, but his sport was always soccer.

"I played basketball and ran track, but soccer has always been my sport since I was really young," said Edelman.

When deciding on college, many high school athletes look to the "prime-time" universities that showcase their particular sport. This could have happened for Edelman, who lives only 40 miles from soccer powerhouse, Rutgers University.

"I wanted to go to school as far away from Jersey as possible. Since one of my closest friends (who graduated a year before he did) played here at UMass, I considered them as my first choice."

Even though Edelman left New Jersey to come to Amherst, he always anticipates the trips back to his home state, especially the games against the Atlantic 10 rival Scarlet Knights.

"I always look forward to playing at Rutgers. Many of the guys on my club team back home are on the team (Rutgers), and they like to taunt me by predicting a loss for us."

This year, when the Minutemen traveled to Piscataway for a Saturday night clash against Rutgers, Edelman proved he was a threat to opponents as well as a bona fide scorer for his team.

He scored a critical goal that helped UMass tie their archrival 2-2, setting up a possible rematch between the top two teams in the A-10 Championships, also held at Rutgers.

A high school forward, Edelman converted to midfield when he joined the Minutemen. He has flourished in this position because of his speed and offensive awareness on the field.

Edelman's career here at the University has been marked by changes. From the near demise of the soccer program to the dawn of a new age with a new coach, Sam Koch, he has seen a change within the team's chemistry, as well as the increase in personnel.

"Since my freshman year, the talent level has risen greatly. Coach Koch has really meant a lot to this team this season. He is a player's coach."

A coach always knows his players best, and Koch feels that Edelman is a vital part of the Minutemen.

"Justin is a really good player that makes the offense go," said Koch. When asked of Edelman's performance on Saturday, he added, "He had an excellent second half against Siena, probably the best he has played all year."

Edelman's play has made UMass a contender in the Atlantic 10, but is quick to credit his teammates.

"If we play up to our potential as a team, I don't see a game left on our schedule that we can't win."

Fall air brings promise of hoop

Some preseason talk on pro and college basketball

Jeff
CROFTS

Well, now that I'm singing soprano, I can feel the cool fall air bringing the climax of the baseball year, prime-time of the football season, beginning of hockey, and most of all the excitement of the upcoming basketball season.

All the b-ball magazines, Street and Smith, Dick Vitale, The Sporting News etc., are starting to hit newsstands right about now. Therefore it is time for me to donate nearly all of my columns from now on to the hoopworld.

First off, let's look at the NBA and what has happened so far in the offseason:

In the Atlantic Division:

The Knicks immediately jumped ahead of everyone else in the Atlantic Division with all their wheeling and dealing.

A starting frontline of Patrick Ewing, Charles Oakley, and Charles Smith is downright scary. Add Tony Campbell and Anthony Mason coming off the bench and you have a frontcourt that has it all, low-post scoring (Ewing and Smith), rebounding (everyone except Campbell), a good outside shooter (Campbell), toughness (Mason and Oakley), and shotblocking (Ewing and Smith).

In the backcourt the Knicks have done a good job in patching up their one major weakness, outside shooting. Getting Rolando Blackman for a 1995 first round draft pick rivals getting Manhattan Island for $22 worth of trinkets as the steal of all-time. Blackman, along with rookie Hubert Davis will delight Madison Square Garden fans with their sweet shooting strokes.

In a minor move New York renounced the rights to off-guard Gerald Wilkins. Wilkins, a major league athlete, was also a major league headache for Pat Riley with his unreliable jumper and crazy, sick dog drives to the hoop.

The big questions regarding the Knicks will involve the readiness of Greg Anthony to run the offense and the team chemistry. In those two questions are answered affirmatively then the rest of the NBA had better watch out.

As much as I like Shaquille O'Neal and his huge dunks, I cannot wait to see Ewing school him on the finer points of the game during their Atlantic Division skirmishes.

Finer points like a baseline turnaround jumper, followed by a dribble drive to the hole for a facial, followed by jump hook in the post. O'Neal might very well be the next franchise player but it's going to take a lot more than his offensive arsenal of crazy dunks to get him there.

Miami is another Atlantic Division club which has made a big stride in the offseason. In acquiring John Salley from the Pistons, the Heat have made a major move in toughening up their frontcourt.

Miami, which is supposedly trying to deal for Hakeem Olajuwon, has got to settle on their backcourt and whose playing what. They have too many guards for too little spots. Steve Smith, Bimbo Coles, Brian Shaw, Willie Burton, and rookie Harold Miner will all be competing for backcourt roles.

In other NBA news:

The Indiana Pacers and Minnesota Timberwolves swapped small forwards and point guards when the Pacers sent Chuck Person and Michael Williams to Minnesota in exchange for Sam Mitchell and Pooh Richardson.

What to make of this deal? Well, it seems as though both teams got what they wanted. Indiana got a tough, unselfish wingman in Mitchell in addition to Richardson, who will run the club.

Minnesota got some much-needed instant offense in Person, who has never met a shot he didn't like, and some much-needed speed in Williams. Williams might have played his way into the Pacer doghouse with his miserable defensive showing against John Bagley in the playoffs.

Watch for Kendall Gill and Larry Johnson to emerge as the new tag team champions of the NBA. Gill is ready to explode onto the scene as one of the top three guards in the league, end of story. As for Johnson, his skills and charisma make him a leading contender as the torch carrying player for the 90's.

It is time to move onto college basketball:

Nice to see Midnight Madness is scheduled for Halloween this year. Students are just going to be crazy, rearing to go, anxious for the upcoming season.

I think I'll make lineup projections for the Minutemen.

Up front, you have to start off with 1991-92 Atlantic Player of the Year Harper Williams manning the pivot. Joining Williams up front should be the versatile Tony Barbee and sophomore banger Lou Roe.

Adding depth up front will be Kennard Robinson, the returning giant Jeff Meyer, sophomore Ted Cottrell, Tommy Pace and incoming freshman Dana Dingle, who could also see some time in the backcourt.

In the backcourt, there are sophomores galore. Michael Williams will probably man the point with Jerome Malloy as his bombing side kick. Derrick Kellogg, junior Chris Robinson, and possibly Dingle will all get see some court action.

Next week: More court rumblings and predictions.

Some of you may remember my last baseball column (Boston-New York World Series?) and will laugh. Obviously, I was juuuust a bit off. My only excuse is what every baseball writer will use - injuries and sub-par performance by several key players (Only 12 All-Star or Gold Glove players between the Red Sox, Mets and Dodgers)

1992 was a memorable year for several reasons: proposed realignment, the firing of a commissioner, a new ballpark in Baltimore, the possibility of the Giants moving out of Candlestick, but what every baseball fan loves is a good old fashioned pennant race. 1992 did not disappoint.

Minnesota, Toronto, Cincinnati and Pittsburgh emerged as the early front-runners, with Oakland, Baltimore, San Francisco, and the New York Mets close behind.

The NL East race was a battle of mediocrity until early June. After 51 games, Pittsburgh, St. Louis and New York all had 27-24 records. New York turned into the walking wounded, and St. Louis discovered that one good pitcher (Bob Tewksbury) cannot carry a team. Montreal made one of the best decisions for their team and the sport by making Felipe Alou their manager. Alou took them out of the cellar and brought them into a tie into for first before falling flat at the end. Nonetheless, it showed that a manager really does have a strong impact on a team's performance, and, that more minority hirings are on the horizon.

The NL West race was a seesaw between Cincinnati and San Francisco until mid-June when Atlanta caught fire and never looked back. They went from fourth place to first in less than a month by simply winning: at home, on the road, against the good, the bad and the ugly. San Diego was never able to get enough pitching to go along with the hitting, but managed to make the race a three-way chase for most of the summer.

The AL East race saw Toronto came out of the gates like the racehorses everyone said they were, but Baltimore was hot on their hooves and following the .650 pace. The remaining five teams struggled to stay over .500, until July, when Mil-

Tutu calls for equality, justice and peace

Speech inspires many

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

In addition to being inspired by Archbishop Desmond Tutu's speech which urged all people to come together and oppose racism, students who attended the event also felt his visit to the University was perfect timing.

"The message he presented was right on time," said Thomas Simpson, a junior economic major, who reflected upon a more tense racial climate here on campus since the Rodney King trial and recent harassment against a Black Resident Assistant in Southwest.

"He's letting the students know we have to come together. We're destroying our future," said Simpson, who said he especially liked Tutu's emphasis on humanity and the idea that if one group is oppressed, no one is free.

"Racism must be gone," said Simpson, who thought the speech was "very inspiring." From an economic standpoint, Simpson said if society is to work together effectively to its potential, no one can be oppressed.

Junior economics major Edward Wiredu said his talk about the absurdity of racism "really hit a lot of people the right way."

"And hopefully people understood what he was saying, and that the fight against racism is not just for Blacks or Whites, or Asians —it's for all people," said Wiredu.

Fabiola Narcisse, President of the UMass Black Student Union found his speech "very enlightening and uplifting."

"It heightened our awareness to the injustice [of racism] and we need to do something about it," said Narcisse. "Even though the struggle in Africa continues, the struggle

Calls racism 'blasphemous'

By MARTIN F. JONES

Calling for an end to all forms of racism, Archbishop Desmond Tutu emphasized the equality of all people as he addressed the University of Massachusetts yesterday afternoon at the Fine Arts Center.

"Each one of us is of infinite worth, because each of us are created in the image of God," he said.

Bishop Tutu was the winner of the 1984 Nobel Peace Prize. His visit was sponsored by the Episcopal Chaplaincy at UMass and is the first stop on a 10-day national tour.

Proceeds from the lecture will be used to benefit the Bishop Tutu Fund, a scholarship program aimed at helping Black South Africans to study abroad in the United States and Britain.

The event opened with an introduction by the Rev. Christopher Carlisle, Episcopal Chaplain at UMass, in which he gave a biographical account of Tutu's life and struggle against the apartheid system of government in South Africa.

Following the introduction was a musical performance by the Barwa singers, a group of South African students, and Amandla, a vocal choir from Greenfield, Mass., singing political songs from the anti-apartheid movement.

Tutu began his presentation by thanking those present for their role in the fight against apartheid, citing the significance of recent student movements that have put pressure on the United States to maintain economic sanctions against the South African government.

"There will be victory for all of us in South Africa, Black and White together. Thank you for your contribu-

Kidman films new thriller in Amherst

By MICHELLE ROBBINS

Many members of the community are excited that the filming of the suspense-thriller movie starring Nicole Kidman and Bill Pullman is taking place in Amherst.

But some University of Massachusetts students have managed to land a small part as an extra in the film, tentatively titled, "Damages."

Philip Wen, a senior economics major, said, "It's very exciting to see what goes on behind the scenes first hand."

Wen said in order to be cast as an extra he went to the try-outs at Smith College about three weeks ago. "The casting director, Raquelle Osborne, talked to me for five seconds, took my picture and said she would call me back if she could use me."

According to Wen, an estimated 1000 people tried out for the part of an extra and only about 100 to 200 people were called back to be in the film. "I think the casting director was looking for a certain college look," he said.

Kristen Cartee, a senior psychology major, said it was exciting to be cast in the film at first, but now she realizes she isn't going to have a big part in the film.

"When I called the casting director to see if I got the part she told me if I had a car I could be an extra," Cartee said.

Wen said in the first scene he did, he had to casually walk down a street with Cartee. "I worked for three hours on that one scene and I will only appear in the film for a matter of seconds," he said.

"When I told my parents I was going to be in a movie they were excited because I would be earning money," said Cartee. She earned $40 for three hours work and $15 because she brought her car to Teach-in protests Columbus Day

By DAVID LAFONTANA
Collegian Correspondent

Approximately 20 students occupied Memorial Hall yesterday afternoon in protest of the Columbus Day holiday. The group, calling themselves Students for Education, are protesting the "celebration" of Columbus Day and violence against women of color.

Instead of celebrating, the group hopes to spend the day educating, making the holiday an official "Day of Education" and hold workshops on "500 years of violence".

With UMass police and security keeping watch at the building's entrances, the protesters kept their vigil, talking to passing students with a speaker and playing Malcolm X speeches out the second story window.

In a letter to Governor Weld the group spoke out against what they felt was an "immoral" holiday.

"The state of Massachusetts must discontinue the tradition of celebrating Columbus Day as a holiday," said the letter. The letter went on to compare the discovery of America with apartheid in South Africa and the Jewish Holocaust.

The group is asking for 40 scholarships for low income women of color and the set-up of a program that aids students of color.

"We're not taking over the building, we're holding a teach-in, and we're communicating with the people, with the community at-large, the fact that we aren't celebrating Columbus Day," said group member Cara Lee Birch. "The University has failed to respond to the needs of minorities, particularly women of color."

The group expressed anger at the fact that there were little or no resources on campus for women of color.

"Basically, what we're asking is that the state not recognize Columbus Day as a holiday, because for people of color in America and all over the world it's not a celebration," said Birch.

Idaho gunmen plead innocent

BOISE, Idaho (AP)- Two northern Idaho men pleaded innocent Tuesday to charges in a 10-count federal indictment alleging murder, conspiracy, assault and firearms violations surrounding a bloody August standoff.

Randy Weaver, 44, and Kevin Harris, 25, were arraigned before U.S. Magistrate Larry Boyle on revised charges a grand jury handed up last Thursday. Most of the counts were consolidated from earlier indictments.

The charges stem from Aug. 21 gunfight and resulting 11-day siege at Weaver's mountaintop cabin near Naples. Deputy U.S. Marshal William Degan was killed in the shootout and Weaver's wife and 14-year-old son died later.

Boyle scheduled a trial for both men to begin Oct. 26 before U.S. District Judge Harold Ryan. Attorneys involved said they expected to be ready to begin on schedule. The trial could take up to six weeks.

Both Weaver and Harris are being held without bond in the Ada County Jail.

Weaver pleaded innocent Tuesday to charges of aiding and abetting first-degree murder, conspiracy, two counts of assaulting federal officers, three firearms violations, failure to appear in court on a 1990 firearms charge and committing crimes after being released by a federal magistrate on other charges in January 1991.

If convicted, he faces the death penalty or life in prison on the charges of aiding and abetting murder and five years in prison and a $250,000 fine on the conspiracy count. Weaver could receive another five years and $250,000 fine for failure to appear, 10 years and $250,000 on each of the assault charges and two of the three firearms counts, five years and $250,000 on the third firearms charge,

Recent incidents recorded by the University's Department of Public Safety.

• A chemical explosion in the Lederle Research Tower classroom injured a student on Monday evening, sending shards of glass flying through the room.

Naoki Yoshioka, 29, received lacerations to his face after his chemical experiment exploded at approximately 11 p.m., according to Don Robinson, an official with the Environmental Health & Safety Department.

Yoshioka, a visiting scholar from Japan, was rushed to Cooley Dickinson Hospital by an Amherst Fire ambulance. He was treated and released from the emergency room late Monday evening, hospital officials said.

Health officials were called in to survey the damage and cleaned up the shattered glass and chemical spill. "We're investigating the cause of the explosion now through use of the notes that were kept," said Robinson.

• A man reported to police that he dropped his calculator in Melville Residence Hall Monday night and witnessed another person picking it up. That person denied having possession of the calculator.

After Housing officials investigated the 9:30 p.m. incident, the calculator was recovered and returned to the owner.

• University police received a report of stolen laundry from a woman in Cance Residence Hall on Monday evening. The woman reportedly placed her clothes in a washing machine and returned to find them stolen. The value of the stolen clothes is approximately $430, according to police.

• Staff members at the Telephone Center reported damage to the main door of their equipment building Monday morning. According to police, the damage, believed to be caused by a rock thrown at the door, was estimated at $40.

Meter readers hit by corruption charges

By TONY ROGERS
Associated Press

BOSTON- In a city where empty parking spaces are about as common as a Red Sox victory and parking tickets seem to be on every other windshield, accusations of corruption among meter readers are making news.

Ten of the city's meter readers have been accused of accepting free meals in exchange for ignoring parking violations in front of downtown businesses, or of falsifying tickets in order to cover up extended lunch breaks.

Last month, the 10 were suspended while the city mulled disciplinary action.

But union officials have cried foul, charging that the city hired a private undercover investigator to spy on the meter readers, and that the detective went so far as to date one of them.

Now some accused employees are threatening to sue, and the union says it will take the matter to an arbitrator.

The issue has special meaning in Boston's congested downtown, where finding a parking space can be a blood sport and keeping the meter pumped with quarters is an acquired skill.

"Some of them [meter readers] are nice, but they'll get you," said Steven Perlberg, a salesman who parks downtown regularly. "You walk around here and you'll see a ton of tickets. It's brutal."

Racial incidents anger campus, administration

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Staff

Students and administrators at the University of Massachusetts are condemning the recent wave of racial attacks against students of color as campus police continue their investigation.

Arlens Barosy, the Resident Assistant on the 17th floor of Washington tower, found his hall defaced with racial slurs and human excrement this weekend.

Jen Wood, president of the Undergraduate Student Government, was appalled by the apparent personal attack against the Black RA.

"This is horrible. The racist behavior exhibited by the perpetrator(s) must not be tolerated at any expense," said Wood. "This oversteps the barrier. It's blatant racism and ignorance."

Wood, who questions why no arrests have been made so far, feels RAs do not have the adequate resources or support to enforce the rigid "no alcohol" policy within the dorms.

"The RAs should not be placed in the position to enforce university policy," said Wood. The attack on the RA was apparently sparked by a previous incident where the RA was physically assaulted for asking a group of White males to dump out their open containers of alcohol, according to police records.

The SGA president also believes that student organizations should respond positively and aggressively to this incident.

"Student groups need to solidify and join together to put pressure on the administration in order to come up with ways to positively resolve this problem," said Wood.

Students are planning a rally Thursday night to raise awareness about these recent attacks.

Thomas B. Robinson, recently-appointed vice chancellor for student affairs, said many forms of harassment have been aimed at Resident Assistants of color since the beginning of the semester.

"This disturbing behavior has no place on campus," said Robinson in a letter obtained by the Collegian. "In a community which strives to recognize and respect the freedom and dignity of every human being, acts of intolerance hurt all of us."

Robinson said the University will use campus disciplinary means and the court system to punish those involved. In addition, writes Robinson, "student hosts will be held responsible for the behavior of their guests."

Nelson Acosta, director of the Office of Third World Affairs, believes this problem must be addressed immediately by the administration in order for students to feel assured that their concerns are being appropriately handled.

"This racial incident must not be tolerated by students or the administration if this is allowed to continue to divide this community," said Acosta. "Let us acknowledge that racism is a social disease and should be treated as such."

Alison Roberge, a freshman English major, was shocked by the recent incidents of racial attacks and graffiti.

"I'm absolutely disgusted," said Roberge. "This is something the University must deal with immediately through educational and safety policies."

Jack Luippold, the recently-appointed director of Public Safety, said the department is investigating the reports of graffiti "of a racial nature."

OTWA director looks to unify UM

Acosta hopes students feel welcome at University

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Staff

The director of the University of Massachusetts Office of Third World Affairs is taking the initiative to reorganize and set into motion the theme of unity spearheaded by its new director.

Nelson Acosta, the present director, sees new life coming into the organization and hopes that students truly feel they have a place that welcomes them.

"I am here for the students in hopes to share my knowledge and experience with students who are in transition," said Acosta.

The mission of the office is to assess the quality of life in the residence halls such as public safety and cultural programming, for example.

Acosta believes this presents an exciting challenge to the OTWA team.

"This is a tremendous task and requires lots of energy and input from the team," said Acosta.

Acosta feels there is a strong need to bring unity among students of different nationalities and cultures on this campus.

"We need to develop student leaders, that will promote unity and cooperation within the campus community," said Acosta.

Acosta also believes that educating students from a Third World perspective is imperative to having an impact on the campus community.

The office is planning a student leadership conference next semester where student representatives of their unique cultures can come together and have constructive dialogue.

"This is a way to start building alliances and stronger leadership skills that are necessary to address pertinent issues and meeting future challenges," said Acosta.

He also believes that there is a need to be conscious of "who we are in the community."

"There must be a family to be identified with on this campus. We must represent a chain linked to the past and connected with the future," said Acosta. "An extended family is most appropriate, students need to create stronger bonds with the University and faculty."

Acosta earned his bachelor's degree in sociology and a second degree in legal studies at the University of Massachusetts.

Women seek shelter with local program

By STACY MALONE
Collegian Staff

Womanshelter/Companeras in Holyoke provides programs to assist women and children who are battered in the Greater Holyoke-Chicopee Area.

"Women call the 24-hour hotline because they need to talk," said Edith Jennings-Wigfall, the Volunteer program coordinator of Womanshelter/Companeras. "Women call if they are being battered and sometimes women aren't sure if they are being battered."

Jennings-Wigfall said women will often call to find out what their rights are, how to become involved in support groups and how to find shelter and services.

Some of the programs the shelter offers are a 24-hour hotline, shelter in a confidential location, support groups and community education programs.

The 24-hour hotline is currently run by 80 trained volunteers. Jennings-Wigfall said the volunteers play a big part in working with the women and children, getting women involved in support groups and policy-making for the shelter.

"The emergency shelter houses up to eight women and 16 to 18 children for six to eight weeks," stated Jennings-Wigfall. She said the shelter does not put anybody out on the street, is handicapped accessible and assists the women in making their next move. Jennings-Wigfall said the support groups are available through the 24-hour hotline and occur once a week. She said childcare is not presently available, but women are welcome to bring their children.

The community education program through Womanshelter/Companeras is another way the shelter gives to the surrounding community. The Teen Dating Violence Program is part of the community/shelter exchange. The volunteers in this program make 45 minute presentations for people 13-years-old and up concerning violence and their dating relationships, said Jennings-Wigfall.

"The presentations in the Teen Dating Violence Program explain different kinds of violence in co-ed groups," said Jennings-Wigfall. "Date rape is discussed, how to say no, verbal abuse and when a boy is being controlling."

Womanshelter/Companeras served 1600 women last year and is funded through grants and fundraising events, such as, their second major auction this summer which raised five thousand dollars.

Leverett hosts peace group's 7th birthday

By KELLY GEERS
Collegian Correspondent

Hundreds gathered Sunday in Leverett to celebrate the seventh anniversary of the New England Peace Pagoda.

The ceremony consisted of worship, including interreligious worship, speakers and music.

"The past seven years have brought out many changes in the world," said mistress of ceremonies Ingrid Askew. Askew noted the world wide changes that have taken place since the Peace Pagoda opened seven years ago.

"There is much suffering in the world, much more than what we see on the 6 o'clock news," she said. Askew then praised the efforts by Sr. Clare Carter of the Pagoda, as well as the many individuals who worked for peace.

The ceremonies were opened by Slow Turtle, Supreme Medicine Man of the Wampanoag Nation.

Slow Turtle gave thanks to the Mother Earth and praised the work of the Buddhists who came to Leverett on sacred land, during his opening prayer.

Prayers were then given in Hindu, Jewish, Christian, Muslim and Sikh, to accommodate the many varied worshipers who attended the services.

"The Peace Pagoda rises as a pure prayer," said John Schuchardt, who gave the Christian sermon.

Keynote speakers included Rita Clark, Director of the Nicaragua-U.S. Friendship office in Washington D.C.

Clark spoke of her on-going work on behalf of the Nicaraguan people, a nation that is facing a 60-70 percent unemployment rate.

Also speaking, was Ben Swann, community advocate, educational consultant, and psychologist from Springfield.

Swann spoke of the positive movements rising within the urban population.

In his message, Ven. Higai Matsuya, Elder Monk of Nipponzan Myohoji, called the day, "a Japanese fine day," noting the beautiful fall weather.

Said Matsuya, "Today we pray for world peace and celebrate the seventh anniversary of the Peace Pagoda."

Senior communications major Creston Patterson said he rushed out to get a ticket the first day and was very inspired by Tutu's speech.

"He brought the whole community together as a unit," Patterson said.

"He's a tribute to humanity," said junior English major Pamela Sharron. "His message about racism was incredibly articulated. He's a voice that everyone should hear."

Diane Johnson, an Amherst resident, who works at the Peace Development Fund said she felt he issued an important challenge for everyone — to combat racism in their lives.

Others, however, agreed with the occupying students. "I don't think they should call it Columbus Day, anymore. He's an idiot." said student Mikhaela Houston.

Early in the evening, Dan Melley, vice-chancellor for University Relations and Development, asked the group to move to the public meeting room on the building's first floor, but the group refused. Melley reminded the group that they were in violation of the Student Code of Conduct.

The group vowed to stay until they received word from the University and the Governor's office. Later, the University sent Ombudsperson Janet Rifkin to talk with the protestors. The Governor's office had not responded as of press time.

Upon graduation, Acosta took on the position of recruitment coordinator for the Bilingual Collegiate Program (BCP) from 1983-85, and served as assistant director of undergraduate admissions from 1985-1992. He is currently completing his master's degree in multicultural curriculum and organizational development.

Acosta left his position in an attempt to touch base with the students at UMass and serve in the capacity of resource person and give input on matters pertaining to students of different nationalities and divergent cultures.

Currently, Acosta is researching the possibility of promoting a yearbook within the Third World community and the University.

Acosta is very pleased and equally excited that the OTWA team has such great potential. He said the Third World yearbook would include various students and alumni that have contributed and participated in promoting a positive Third World image on campus.

A winning fight for change

Allow me, if you will, to tell you a story. It is a story of empowerment, of how fear of the opposition can be defeated by faith, of how when you believe in something strongly enough you can make it happen.

My friend worked in a well-established restaurant this summer. On the outside the staff, from the waiters to the chefs, seemed to be hard-working, professional people. But as in many cases, the eye was deceiving. Many male workers took on the role of the oppressive chauvinist behind the scenes. Women's names were often replaced by "baby," "hon" and "sweetie." Derogatory and demeaning remarks were a common occurrence. On the occasion of a Gloria Steinem lecture one waiter observed, "These women think they have something between their legs." Homophobia also lingered in the air, with offensive comments that only waited to humiliate.

E.C.
THOMAS

Enraged, disrespected and frustrated, the women in the restaurant banded together to fight for respect. Their first step was to call a meeting headed by the owner of the restaurant. Unfortunately, but not surprisingly, their concerns were brushed over casually. No great changes were seen. Still angry, and with belief in their cause, two women representing the whole scheduled a meeting alone with the owner. With careful organization of their thoughts, including the language they would use and specific examples and requests, the three met. And things changed. The owner, angry that he had harbored such a disrespectful staff, called a mandatory meeting and announced loud and clear that this behavior would cease. "We are not animals here!" he bellowed. He then clearly laid down the rule that you would either respect and accept one another or be asked to leave.

Content with the meeting but still wary over whether things would really change this time, the women went to work as usual only to find that their worries would soon disappear.

The owner stood by his words and within two days of the meeting, three male employees were fired. The atmosphere of the restaurant changed into a healthy, admirable environment. Respect and acceptance replaced the ignorance and egos. All because those who believed in change fought and won. As she told me this story me friend said, "It's like a movement, something's happening."

Yes, a restaurant seems like small-scale compared to a town or city or country. But what if there were many of these restaurants, one in each town, two on each city block, hundreds in each country? Its not what size a movement is that can measure its importance; rather, it is the belief in that cause that enhances its value. Every employee on that staff learned a valuable lesson in respect. Now whenever they take on a job, they will hopefully take that lesson with them, maybe even teach it to others. Others will learn and the movement will grow.

Don't ever let yourself think your beliefs don't matter. As students at UMass, we know too well the effect bureaucracies have on our beliefs and the motivation behind them. But you can't back down. As intimidating as the opposition to your beliefs may be, don't let them go unheard. To say that you can't make a difference is a cop out, for you can, and by following your beliefs you will.

Should we be impressed?

I was walking down a dorm hallway they other day when something struck me as odd. I am not a seasoned expert on the University's policy on dormitory presentability, but I thought it a little out of the ordinary that alongside the mysterious scrawl "NIGRR'S SUCK," someone had taken it upon themselves to proudly display their feces on the wall. I wasn't quite sure what the graffiti was supposed to refer to, but I thought there might be more appropriate ways of showing one's support for its statement than by doing something so. . . visual. Although I lauded their initiative, I just thought it was a bit out of place.

Nathan
CRICK

The phrase "Nigrr's Suck" perplexed me even more though, and to tell you the truth I felt a little embarrassed that I didn't know what it meant. If it was significant enough for someone to smear feces on a wall, well, I thought I was missing out on something big. Hell, if I knew what it was, maybe I would've even pissed on the floor a little bit. I didn't know what or who this Nigrr was. It must have been some kind of person, seeing nobody would get so excited over, say, a vacuum cleaner that could suck a nail out of wood. Even assuming "Nigrr" was a proper name still didn't clear up just what the word "Suck" had to do with them.

Did these people have possession of something called a "Suck?" If they did, it raised the question of what in devil's name a "Suck" was. Did it answer who killed J.F.K.? Was it a new dish detergent that could clean those pesky stains you get in plastic bowls when you heat sauce in the microwave? You'd figure if they were showing something they'd make it more obvious, like a billboard that bragged they had "The One and Only Nigrr's Fabulous Suck," with flashing lights and popcorn. But they didn't. Maybe this Suck referred to the person's feces; maybe they were so proud of what they did in the toilet they had to show the world.

That was overly repulsive, so I continued to ponder. The only other thing it could be, assuming the person had the intelligence to write with correct grammar, was that this Nigrr was described as "Suck." I've never heard anyone called Suck, and if it was complimentary I'd feel pretty bad nobody ever called me Suck.

Then I sat for a moment, and thought about the kind of person who might be ignorant enough not to realize it wasn't proper etiquette to smear crap on the wall. I sadly realized that this might not be complimentary at all, but a cruel and hateful act by someone who didn't have enough self-respect to accept that anyone who didn't hide behind cowardly graffiti and racial slurs wasn't a threat to their personal growth as entrepreneurial bigots.

It made me feel kind of sorry for them. I mean, it's really pitiful when people do things in order to make others feel ashamed of what they are. It's not just pitiful for that reason either, it's pitiful because these people actually believe anyone could really give a damn what a couple of ignorant clumps of flesh might think in what constitutes their tiny minds.

Do they think this impresses anybody? That it's going to make anybody stop and think, "Hey, you know, maybe Nigrr's DO suck?" Or that it will make anyone cower in fear under the unspoken threat that next time they'll cough up a phlegm globber on the rug and scrawl "Blak Peepal's Stnkk" on the bulletin board?

It doesn't matter what they do, they're not proving anything. Well no, I shouldn't say that. Anything anybody does holds a certain value to the world as a whole. To me, these pitiful creatures show how little human beings can be worth sometimes, and it saddens me that events like this keep pushing my opinion lower, and lower, and lower. It makes me want to resign to the fact that there is no such thing as natural human dignity, and I think for them to be able to do that is what really disturbs us all.

Vandalism is result of ignorance

In response to this past weekend's incident in Washington Residence Hall, we, as both an Area Government and as individuals, would like to express our concern for such belligerent conduct on this campus and in our area.

This issue of racism hits home for a lot of us. Whether it affects us directly or indirectly, the point is that it affects all of us whether we choose to acknowledge it or not. We, as a governing body, speak out now to express that we neither condone nor support such appalling actions as seen in the past and present, relating not only to racism but anti-Semitism and homophobia as well.

Finally, for those individuals who participated in the destruction of Arlens Barosy's floor in Washington and others involved in such perfidious and abhorrent behavior, we leave you with this thought: the old adage that although you may think "ignorance is bliss," you are sadly mistaken, for in this case it is you who are truly the unhappy and unfortunate ones.

Appreciate diversity

As students, we look around and see many different cultures. The effort we make to become aware of diverse cultures is our own responsibility. During the past weeks our ability to accept other ethnic backgrounds has been tested and some have failed to meet the challenge. The incidents that occurred to Arlens Barosy, 17th floor RA in Washington, reflect the inability of some people to deal with the mix of races. Not only has the problem arisen from non-students, but also students who reside at this institution. This is the problem Joseph Zannini, executive director of Housing Services, needs to consider. It is the responsibility of residents to choose guests wisely.

The people of authority need to address this with seriousness and concern. We are not dealing with simple vandalism; we are dealing with the civil rights of a human being. When we make the decision to attend a large university that stresses cultural awareness as UMass does, we take the challenge of accepting diversity. We must respect those things that are different than what we're accustomed to. We come to UMass to learn and understand. Through this we should begin to appreciate differences.

EWC programs welcome women of color

I feel an urgent need to respond to Shyamala Ivatury's article "UM women lack services: EWC counselor seeks programs for women of color [Collegian, Oct. 1]." As the primary person interviewed, I'd like to clarify some issues raised. The slanted tone of this article seems likely to have the opposite effect, discouraging women of color from using EWC services.

While staff at EWC are well aware and openly discuss service gaps in providing services for women of color, I don't agree with Ms. Ivatury's interpretation that EWC has "no programs that are readily available for women of color and low-income women." The loss of wages and the Third World Women's Program (renamed "Bridge Program") resulted in a void in programs which specifically serve women of color. However, all remaining EWC programs are available for women of color and low-income women, and efforts are being made to address their specific needs. For example, the Counseling Program targets for service provision low-income women with limited or no resources for counseling (all counseling services, as well as other program services at EWC, are free). Also, the Counselor/Advocate and Educator/Advocate Volunteer Training Programs include the following training sessions: "Anti-Oppression Training," "Institutional Oppression of Women of Color and Low-Income Women," and "Providing Culturally Appropriate Counseling Services." All EWC programs actively recruit women of color for staff positions in an effort to increase multiculturalism within the Center. I did not say that current EWC programs do not meet the needs of women of color. I said the C/A Program currently has no bilingual capability and can't meet the needs of women for whom English is not the dominant language, so [they] are referred to other agencies. Although women of color are actively encouraged to become counselor/advocates, at the present time the C/A Program has a limited number of women of color to provide services for women of color who prefer a woman of color as a counselor. Training of C/A and E/A program staff is geared to specifically prepare staff to work with ALL women, including women of color.

I never indicated that the C/A application process was inaccessible to women of color. In fact, I stressed that the application process had been made accessible through outreach efforts and specific interview questions regarding comfort with a multicultural agenda and training which emphasizes anti-racism.

I am very open to constructive criticism and suggestions for moving forward with EWC's goal of becoming more multicultural. However, I think it is important to recognize that EWC does provide essential services for women of color. We as a staff acknowledge our service gaps and are working hard to correct them. In the meantime, destructive criticism such as that reflected in Ms. Ivatury's article seems only to serve to increase feelings of alienation among women of color who might need services available to them through EWC.

This week's best and worst on HSCN

By JAMIE GORNSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Welcome to another edition of the Campus Cable Connection! For those of you who keep close tabs on this column, you may have noticed last week that my evil twin Mike attempted to take credit for my article. Alas, he has been severely chastised and has sadly returned to his regular day job of coordinating outfits for the Husky Boys department mannequins at Sears. Poor Mike. Anyway, I have returned and will be bringing you my weekly picks and pans for good ol' HSCN. Now, here are the movies that will be shown beginning Wednesday, October 7.

April Fools Day — Deborah Foreman, Griffin O'Neal, Clayton Rohner. Whoa, all-star, Oscar-winning cast here, huh" Anyone ever heard of these guys before? Me either. Yep, they act that way, too. A very dry and overworked plot, attempting to pattern itself after Friday the 13th and failing miserably. It's a college weekend get-away with murder and mystery. Whodunit? Whogivesacrap? Not I. And somebody PLEASE explain the ending to me if you possibly can. NO STARS.

For the Boys — Bette Midler, James Caan. Potentially excellent movie that just lasts WAY too long and was obviously trying to win some Oscars. Midler and Caan are stand-up performers who entertain soldiers during WWII and stay together through many trials and tribulations until Vietnam, where there are many powerful tearjerking scenes. If you've got quite a bit of time to spare, then don't miss it. 1/2

Lucas — Corey Haim, Kerri Green, Charlie Sheen. For once, a film that doesn't portray teenagers as flat, static characters, but shows the thoughtfulness and insight into several different aspects of different types of teens. Lucas (Haim) is a social outcast who falls in love with the beautiful new girl in town (Green) who treats him like a cute little puppy. Thank goodness, and honest ending. Leaves you smiling. 1/2

Sex, lies and videotape — James Spader, Andie McDowell, Peter Gallagher. Writer-director Steven Soderbergh took first prize at the Cannes film festival for this spicy flick. Intriguing movie about a snotty, successful lawyer who takes his frigid wife's sister as his lover and welcomes his old college friend for a visit. Little does he realize the effect all of this will have on him. Mmm Hmm! 1/2

The Grifters — John Cusak, Angelica Huston, Annette Bening. I give Cusak credit; his roles are getting much more challenging as the years go by. His is wonderful in this film about a small-time professional con artist who'll do just about anything to make a buck. Huston (as Cusak's mother/oedipus complex) is so sly, she seems to just ooze across the screen. Beware of the ending scene — its a real shocker. An all-around cinematic masterpiece. ****

How I Got Into College — Anthony Edwards, Corey Parker. Bizarre take-off of the stress factors involved with getting into college. Not very funny when seen BEFORE the college search, but now we can all sit back and laugh, right? College fairs, dazzling entrance essays, SAT's...aren't you glad you don't have to deal with that anymore? I just hope they don't put out a movie How I Got Into Grad School quite yet...1/2

Frankie and Johnny — Michelle Pfieffer, Al Pacino. Cute romance involving a waitress and a short order cook. Pacino is the cook vying for waitress Pfeiffer's affections. A bit overacted and some scenes are reminiscent of Hitchcock's Rear Window. The plot starts to lose it near the ending and the actual ending is cliche and predictable. A bit disappointing, but not bad overall. **

Hook — Robin Williams, Dustin Hoffman, Julia Roberts. Too bad — this film never quite delivered what it set out to do. Williams is Peter Pan as an adult, which I know for many of us destroyed the "Disney World" fantasy. A weak plot but some good special effects. The Lost Boys are adorable on the whole, Hoffman is outstanding as the evil Hook and Roberts is at her absolute WORST! Half of the COINS TA's at UMass could have done a better job as Tinkerbell! Sigh. **

License to Drive — Corey Haim, Corey Feldman, Carol Kane. Whenever I see a film with the two Coreys, it just makes me wince. The two together are just awful! Remember that heinous Dream a Little Dream. Ack! Pass the Pepto. I watched License to Drive at the video store I used to work at in high school and a customer requested that we change the movie after he had been waiting in line for five minutes. 'Nuff said? Good! NO STARS

The Commitments — Robert Arkins, Micheael Aherne, Angelina Ball. My dad forced me to watch this movie this summer, claiming that it was supposed to be extraordinary. I had seen the coming attractions and had already deemed it stupid-looking. Boy, was I wrong. Thanks, Dad! It's absolutely a fantastic film about a soul group in Dublin, determined to be the next big group out of Ireland after U2 and Sinead O'Conner (no Pope jokes, please). The music is outstanding, but it takes a few minutes to get used to the thick Dublin dialect. Outstanding! ****

Maximum Overdrive — Emilio Estevez, Pat Hingle, Laura Harrington. Directorial debut of Stephen King, based on his short story about trucks that come to life and terrorize the world. Trust me, the story itself is excellent and vividly described in King-ish style. He's a terrific novelist and should stay that way. The film is positively horrid and should have stayed that way. NO STARS

Nuns on the Run — Eric Idle, Robbie Coltrane, Camille Coduri. 1990 British film about two thugs who decide to break away from their boss and make it on their own, but screw up and are forced to hide out in a convent as a couple of nuns. Reminiscent of the 1989 American film with DeNiro and Sean Penn, We're No Angels, but this one is infinitely more funny, despite the fact that both lack points when it comes to plot. The one-liners make up for it though. 1/2

St. Elmo's Fire — Ally Sheedy, Andrew McCarthy, Rob Lowe and the rest of the Brat Pack. Great "friends" film about a group of college buddies who must survive in the real world after graduation. I saw it in high school several times, but appreciate it more now that I'm a (gasp) college senior. It's very real-life and captures the essence of "life after college" very well, especially the scene where Lowe realizes that he is not "one of the fraternity guys" anymore. 1/2

Movies that are on HSCN but not reviewed are: Hear My Song, Juice, Man With One Red Shoe, A Passage to India, Shirley Valentine and Star Trek VI.

Wright leaves crowd gasping for breath

By RACHEL D. MEDANIC
Collegian Correspondent

Keying into his audience's capacity to instantly understand and identify with his non-sequiturs, comedian Steven Wright left the crowd gasping for breath in as superb a form as ever Friday night at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall.

Opening for Wright, Barry Crimmons, mostly a political comedian was greeted by denouncement and profanity from a small group of yelling spectators. Crimmons politely thanked them and replied, "I guess when you're as cool as you, you can get seats that far away, too." Crimmons appeared to utilize the incident well by letting it guide him smoothly into his routine. No further comment was heard from the group.

Crimmons put out a biting liberal commentary on a range of issues such as: politics, domestic issues, U.S. foreign policy, the environment, women and AIDS. Of H. Ross Perot's "revolution" ideology/agenda he said, "I'm pretty sure billionaires don't start revolutions I want to be a part of." But commenting from the perspective of those who politically and culturally justify Perot he commented, "Agree with him, his checks are clearing."

Of his many anti-Bush sarcasms, Crimmons attacked Bush's promise to "...do domestically (in the next four years) what I did internationally." Crimmons' comment was, "...he's a little ahead of schedule in South Central L.A." Crimmons said, "People ask me, `If you don't love this country, why don't you get out of it?' I say, `Because I don't want to be victimized by its foreign policy.'"

Wright made his entrance around 9 p.m. to a very enthusiastic crowd. Jumping right into his routine, he started off with, "So I got off the plane and I forgot to undo the seatbelt and I'm pulling the plane along with me, the wings start knocking people over."

Wright's brand of humor that he is merely looking at situations from a different perspective. "I have two brothers and a sister. My sister has three brothers and no sister. When she was little I would tease her, I'd say, `You're not really in this family, you're the only one who doesn't have any sisters.'"

Wright is famous for his deadpan deliveries combined with timing. "I bought a decaffeinated coffee table the other day, you can't even tell by looking at it."

His bizarre is almost never incomprehensible to the listener, "Our school colors were clear. `I'm not naked, I'm in the band.'"

To make you laugh, he enhances the literal aspect of figures of speech. "Everybody dies instantly. It's the only way you can die. You're alive, you're alive, you're alive, you're dead." Another classic one-liner he threw at the audience was, "There is a time and place for everything, and you lost your schedule."

The wealth of Wright's material comes from ideas and situations with which people are acquainted, so acquainted in fact, that they are taken for granted and ignored. He asked, "What's the youngest you can die of old age?" He told the audience that his grandfather was, "...a small claims court jester."

Wright indulged the audience in a song (minimal accompaniment of his own narration on his guitar) called "Little Baby Prostitute." The song was about Wright as a baby who was, "a peripheral visonary. I could see into the future but only way off to the side."

To truly appreciate Wright's waterfall style of humor, his performance must be seen live. At some point logic will ask, "What is he saying?!" But the laughter will inevitably continue.

Garth Brooks cannot leave country's throne

Subpar album can't be a grand finale

By CALEB COCHRAN
Collegian Correspondent

The Chase
Garth Brooks
Liberty Records

The big rumor in the country music circles lately is that Garth Brooks is going to retire. This will be his last album. He will do one more tour of the world, then hang up his Stetson and his fancy cowboy shirts for good. Well, I find it hard to believe that The Chase is Garth's last hurrah. If this was going to be his last album, he would have done it better.

Some of the efforts here are definitely among Garth's finest, but a good portion of this album is subpar, especially for Brooks.

The songs lack the energy and feeling that have come to characterize Brooks.

The two great songs on The Chase are "Dixie Chicken" and "Learning to Live Again." On "Dixie Chicken," a cover of the Little Feat favorite, Garth lets his powerful voice loose and brings back memories of tunes such as "Rodeo" and "The Thunder Rolls" from his previous albums. Brooks' twangy voice, background vocals by Trisha Yearwood and the fiddle of Rob Hajacos combine to give this song a country feel similar to that which Brooks created with Billy Joel's "Shameless" on Ropin' The Wind.

"Learning to Live Again" is the sad story of a man trying to get back into dating after what the listener assumes to be a long absence. Garth didn't write this song, but he makes it his own and the listener really feels for the character that he has created.

Brooks uses his versatile voice to milk all the emotion he can out of this already tear-jerking song. While it doesn't pull at your heart strings as much as some of Brooks' past classics such as "The Dance," it will have you singing the bittersweet chorus soon enough.

Another song which gives life to this album is "That Summer," a tale of a young man who goes to work for a lonely widow and ends up having a relationship with her. As usual, Garth keeps it simple. His voice carries this song, another track with a vivid storyline. Trisha Yearwood adds the harmony on this upbeat track about an older woman who has her youth restored.

Throughout the remainder of the album, Brooks wallows in mediocrity. Although a few of the songs, such as "Mr. Right," "We Shall Be Free" and "Night Rider's Lament" aren't bad, they lack the energy and feeling that have come to characterize Brooks and his music.

Missing from this album is the energy Brooks has previously displayed in songs such as "Mama Loved Papa" and "We Bury The Hatchet," the barroom sing-along feel of "Friends in Low Places," the honky-tonk twang of "Two of a Kind, Workin' on a Full House," and the emotion of "The River" and "If Tomorrow Never Comes."

While The Chase would be a substantial accomplishment for most artists, it is a disappointment for Garth Brooks. Although Garth has slipped a notch with The Chase, my bet is that he'll be back to redeem himself before too long. The king of country music isn't ready to relinquish his throne just yet.

Roger's album is a textural montage of sound

Amused to Death
Roger Waters
Columbia

It's late and you can't sleep. The chirping drone of crickets settles lightly on your ears. A television comes on, whispering bureaucratic noise from the night before. The neighbor's dog barks as Jeff Beck solos his guitar over some subdued keyboards. You're inside the new Roger Waters album, Amused to Death.

Waters, the main writing force behind Pink Floyd from 1972 to 1983, had been gradually intensifying his control over the expression of his material within the group. This process escalated until the The Wall (1980), arguably the Floyd's most famous release. It was a pseudo-autobiographical study of alienation, a theme which Waters continuously excels in expounding on.

In Amused to Death this theme is elevated to a new level as he critiques American (and Western) society's alienation as a whole from the reality which it inhabits.

Not as electronic or forced as his Radio KAOS (1987), or as intensely personal as The Pros and Cons of Hitchhiking (1984), Amused to Death seems to resemble most closely the last Floyd release to feature Waters, The Final Cut (1983).

Once again, war is prominent in the various themes of the album. Waters focuses on the U.S.'s latest imperialist venture, the video-glorified "combat video game" called Desert Storm. Using the cynicism that stands as his hallmark, he sarcastically proposes that "It all makes perfect sense/Expressed in dollars and cents"; how much is the pointless destruction of human life worth?

Waters spends most of the first half of the 72 minute album exploring the justifications for military interventionism: everything from capitalism, patriotism, and entertainment, to "What God Wants", the three-part opus that frames the main body of the work. The two-part piece "Late Home Tonight" describes in stirring, patriotic detail the joy of an air force pilot performing the ultimate duty for his country: ultimate destruction.

The last half of the album winds down to an even deeper cultural introspective of our place in the imperialist schema; how our actions (and more importantly, *in*actions) contribute to the situation we have decided is out of our control. As a reflection of this, Waters book-ends the album with statements by a veteran of World War I, recounting "The Ballad of Bill Hubbard", a young British soldier wounded in No Man's Land who is consumed by despair.

In the climax of the album, "It's a Miracle", Waters sardonically lists unlikely events that have occurred in our TV-twisted reality...or should occur. After travelling this civilized wasteland, he has no choice but to conclude that our society has "amused itself to death," leaving no room for cheery hope-building in the form of ending on an upbeat note.

It's easy to see the surface has only just been scratched on this lyrical and storytelling structure, but what about the music, the paint on Waters' uncompromisingly bleak canvas? Well, once again, his greatest strength lies in his producing ability, amply assisted by Patrick Leonard (Madonna and Toy Matinee co-conspirator).

The album is packed to the limit with Waters' textural montage of supporting sounds including landing jets, backmasking, thunderclaps, missile explosions, TV's, dogs, babies, wet crunching noises, birds, bells, phones, water drips, door slams, booming genies, crowd scenes and sportscaster Marv Albert (yes, Marv Albert).

The music itself, primarily performed by Waters, Leonard, virtuoso Jeff Beck and various holdovers from Waters' previous Bleeding Hearts Band, is naturally very dynamic, springing from moody waves of synthesizers to voluminous crunching power chords without warning.

Most of the music, particularly the judgmental second half, is either slow four-beat rock in the Floyd vein, or sedate ramblings with a gentle percussive streak, arguably his most fleshed-out performance since The Wall.

On the other end of the scale is the "What God Wants" trilogy (the closest Waters will ever get to being funky), and "The Bravery of Being Out of Range", a power anthem which is lyrically satisfying, but a deadweight in the center of the first half.

Vocally, Roger Waters has never been considered a talent. In music with less emotional depth, this would be a serious drawback, but the emotive investment he makes in his varied vocal style generally matches the intensity of his work. Still, it can be difficult to appreciate Waters' range of grunting mumbles and shouts.

In support of his uneven vocals is a body of female singers (including Katie Kissoon, Doreen Chanter and more) who sometimes get leading parts. Also propping up Waters on "Watching TV", a disappointing ballad for the victims of the Tiananmen square repression, is the ubiquitous Don Henley, adding his raspy voice to the mix. Contributors on the musical side include conductor Michael Kamen, the London Welsh Chorale, jazz bassist John Patitucci, Guo Yi and the Peking Brothers and Rita Coolidge.

What all of this amounts to is a solidly constructed Roger Waters album, with all of the attendant Floyd-ish trappings. Amused to Death is most readily accessible to fans of his previous work, with or without Pink Floyd, although anyone can appreciate his mood-building production and caustic, inventive lyrics.

When his inevitable tour rolls around to Western Massachusetts, I highly recommend seeing Waters and his troupe live. He consistently puts on a good multimedia performance that reflects and enhances his studio work, rather than duplicates it. It is Roger Waters' fixation on the completeness of his work that brings fans back to his music again and again.

tion," he said.

Bishop Tutu said there is an upsurge of racism around the world, citing examples in Europe and the United States as well as in his native country of South Africa.

"We must oppose racism in every shape or form," he said. "It is not just evil, it is blasphemous."

He described racial discrimination as "utterly ridiculous," and added that "the color of one's skin is totally irrelevant."

"We are the new people of God, the rainbow people. Be proud of what you are and don't apologize for it," he said.

Bishop Tutu also described his belief in the "oneness of humanity," saying that "we need each other in order to be human."

"We are set in a delicate network of interdependence," said Tutu. "This network includes all of God's creation."

He called for all people to take responsibility for creating a more equal, just and peaceful society. He said this challenge is not one of any particular people, but a challenge for all of humanity.

"It is impossible for one segment of a community to be free and others not to be free," said Tutu.

Bishop Tutu said that "freedom is not a gift of any human being. It is an inalienable right that comes from the fact that we are all created in the image of God."

"Whether we like it or not, we are meant to be instruments of peace," he said. "You and I have this incredible privilege to help bring about God's dream of a world where all are at peace."

Bishop Tutu described his vision of a better world, saying, "There is a much more beautiful world, God's family, the the human family. Isn't it beautiful?"

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Knowing the ropes puts you in an advantageous situation at work. A substantial pay raise is possible. Count on getting a good deal when purchasing a new car.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Candid communication is important today. Take the initiative. Look for ways to improve your financial security. An older person offers some excellent advice; follow it.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Know your own mind when talking with an official. You may keep something unfortunate from happening if you discuss your concerns openly. Give diet-and-exercise another try.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be more practical about money matters. Even some minor changes will make your home more comfortable. Look for opportunities to use new time-saving and money-saving techniques.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Make every effort to clear away a web of confusion this morning. If any real estate deals are pending, settle them this afternoon. A satisfying hobby will help you forget a recent disappointment.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Friendly influences give you an advantage over your competitors. Contact influential officials. Your mate wants to confide a secret. Listen without interrupting.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Recognize the profit potential of a family trust. Something you once thought unattainable will soon move within easy grasp. Generosity marks your relations with your loved ones.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Weigh the pros and cons before making an important decision this morning. Financial agreements can be concluded this afternoon. Your social life accelerates when you reach out.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): The financial outlook improves, thanks to outside influences. Change is difficult but necessary. A compliment could leave you wondering. Stop being so analytical!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Obey a psychic stop sign. You need to slow down and reassess your options. Postpone making important decisions until more information is available. Excitement brews on the romantic front.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Someone in the know may give you a word of warning. Get busy with a financial move you have been considering. Mergers go well. Keep in touch with a brother or sister.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Make a long-distance call and talk to someone whose wisdom and compliments cheer you. Good times lie just ahead. Your Midas touch remains in force.

the set for the film director to use in the movie.

According to Wen, actors and actresses do seem to have very glamorous lifestyles. "When Kidman finished acting out a lunch scene in front of Bonducci's Cafe, a nice, big, silver BMW Sedan pulled up in front of the cafe and whisked her away from the crowds," he said.

Wen said he got the opportunity to met Kidman and talked to her for a few seconds. "I didn't sit down and have dinner with [Kidman] or anything, but she seemed very pleasant and she was very attractive," he said.

■ racism

"These are considered very serious offenses and anyone with any information about these incidents is urged to contact the University police immediatly," said Luippold, in a prepared statement.

Jalil Mendoza, president of AHORA, a Latin student organization, believes that all forms of racial harrassment and prejudice must be confronted.

"Racially motivated incidents are wrong and unjustified. I believe that people do things to others out of fear and ignorance," said Mendoza.

Mendoza also feels the media portrayal of racial issues indirectly contributes to racial violence, insensitivity and stereotyping.

"The media continues to feed us with misinformation," said Mendoza.

Terrie Mayusama, a junior BDIC major, believes that this is one of many issues that are affecting students of different nationalities and cultures.

"It's really sad that we have to deal with this. I hope there comes a day when no one will have to deal with issues of race. Racial harrassment is not only a minority problem, but a majority one as well," said Mayusama.

Paul Gee, a senior communications major, wishes more people could be sensitive of people's cultural heritage.

"Why can't people look at each other for who they are and not skin color and cultural make up," said Gee.

marking both Northeastern and Virginia's top scorers and shutting them out. In the 3-0 loss to Old Dominion last Sunday, Blenis shadowed Kelli James, who has scored 17 goals in 10 games, and James only scored one goal.

Blenis was first team All-Conference in the A-10 last year, and if both her and the team continue to perform in the same manner, she will be again this year.

Massachusetts has played seven teams in the top 20 so far, defeating six of them. Of their last eight games, only one team, Boston University, is in the top 20. The road may be easier at the end, but the Minutewomen show no indications of letting up.

They cannot afford to. After the regular season, the Minutewomen head to Piscataway, NJ for the A-10 Championships. Since the winner of the A-10s does not receive an automatic berth in the NCAA tourney, UMass must be performing well both before and during the A-10s to avoid a repeat scare of last year.

Besides, Northeastern University is one step behind the Minutewomen, both nationally and in New England. The Huskies are currently fifth in the nation, and second in New England, and while UMass defeated them 1-0 earlier in the year, Northeastern is poised to leap over the Minutewomen if they falter.

The importance of being first in New England is not overlooked by Hixon or her squad. If UMass does what it has preached, take one game at a time, they will finish the second half of their season as successfully as they started it.

Simon looks towards IC4A's

By GWENDOLYN McLAURIN
Collegian Correspondent

Matt Simon is a man on the run.

No, he isn't in trouble with the law. Rather he is the top runner on the University of Massachusetts Boy's Cross Country team. Last week, all of Matt's hard work paid off as he was named Atlantic-10 Performer of the Week.

Simon is excited that he and his team should be successful this season. Earlier this season the cross country team defeated Boston College. This was especially gratifying not only for the team but in particular Simon.

"It's more of a personal thing with me," explained Simon. "I almost went to B.C. and most of the guys I raced with in high school went there so whenever I race against them, I'm looking out for them."

He feels that the team has a shot at taking away the top spot in the Atlantic-10 Conference from West Virginia.

"The team this year is definitely better then last year. It's an older team and people have more experience," said Simon, "We've got a pretty good pack. There are a lot of guys who are right around each other."

Simon discovered cross country in eighth grade. When he first heard of it he thought that it was some type of hiking club, but when he was cut from the soccer team he decided to give cross country another look.

Simon really enjoyed and excelled at running, and nothing showed that more than his senior year. During his final season at Lexington High School Simon received national accolades for running the mile in four minutes and fourteen seconds. He was also named All State in both cross country and track.

Simon attributes most of his success to his cross country coach Art Dulong.

"Back in the sixties and early seventies he was just the best there was. He won so many races," said Simon. "I was just very lucky to have him as a coach in Lexington because as far as I'm concerned he is the best distance coach in the nation."

Simon enjoys running both cross country and track but when pressed on which he likes better he reluctantly chose cross country.

"I like cross country because it is more of a pure sport than track," said Simon. "It's just distance running with whatever natural objects are in your way, whether it be hills or trees. But track has its good points, too."

Simon has also set many personal goals for himself this season, especially since it is his senior year.

He is hoping that his hard work will pay off in November at the IC4A Championships. There are over 100 teams competing at this meet and the runners compete for a spots in the nationals.

The top three runners qualify plus the top five runners in each region. Last year, Simon came in sixty-fifth at the IC4A meet, barely missing qualifying. Because he was so close last year he is optimistic about his chances this year.

Although he has no idea what the future holds for him he does know that it will include marathon running, and he'll run them not only for the personal enjoyment but more importantly to win.

"Regardless of whether I succeed in marathons or not... if I run them I'll be competitive, because that's the idea."

Greg's picks

"He who breaks the law goes back to the House of Pain."

That's right. Last week the Syracuse University basketball program got slapped with a year's worth of NCAA sanctions for various wrongdoings. While the penalties weren't stiff — the NCAA cited cooperation from SU as a reason — there'll be no tournament for Jim Boehiem to cry at this season. UMass fans will have to wait a year for an Orange-Minutemen rematch.

I've got to laugh at this, and you should, too. Here's Syracuse, a member of the Big East, absolutely rolling in money, and yet they still got caught cheating. Say what you want about the state of recruiting college athletes, but when you have the reputation and resources SU has, you shouldn't have to cheat.

Greg
SUKIENNIK

UMass athletic programs would kill for the kind of dough and support SU has. Heck, we're just getting the women's lacrosse team back and here's the Orange doling out "extra scholarships" in their men's lax program.

Good riddance. Here's hoping the Big East locks men's hoops out of the conference tourney.

Yesterday's Collegian included a listing of the sports staff's predictions for the American and National Leagues' championship series. Here's mine. It's a little different.

In the AL, an electric short in SkyDome's retractable roof causes one of the panels to crash upon the playing field, instantly killing the entire rosters of the Blue Jays and Athletics. Baseball fans everywhere cheer as the two most hated, overpaid, overrated teams in the game go to that big Fenway in the sky. As punishment for their baseball sins, they play out their afterlife careers in Class D minor league.

With Toronto and Oakland thankfully out of the way, the Pirates-Braves series is for all the marbles. Barry Bonds, playing for a new contract instead of the Pirates, turns in a stellar preformance as Pittsburgh finally wins it all after three tries.

Okay, so the Bills lost. Shut up, already. Any team that turns the ball over five times is going to lose. But frankly, I'm pleased, because now Buffalo has something to play for.

After all, it's only one loss, and life could be worse: I could've been a Patriots fan. There's reason to celebrate in Foxboro this week, since the Pats actually scored three touchdowns in one game. Wow! Unfortunately, the Jets scored 30 to New England's 21, letting a rare possible win get away. Only seven months 'till the number one draft pick, folks. . .

More hockey news: Word has it that Buffalo Sabres management may be considering a move sometime in the future. The Memorial Auditorium is hopelessly small, old, and contains few of those all-important luxury boxes. Sabres management has lost money the past few years, and both Millwaukie and Hamilton, Ont. already have new buildings awaiting a team.

Also in the Adams, the Hartford Whalers begged the state of Connecticut for roughly 26 million dollars to save their drowning franchise. There's an easy solution for the Whale: schedule more games with the Bruins.

How can the NHL be thinking about expansion when it's member teams can't even pay the bills? Small-market teams like Buffalo and Hartford losing money is the first sign of a sports league in trouble. For the NHL's sake, those ESPN ratings had better be good, or there's going to be trouble.

Men's soccer falls to Huskies

Minutemen outshoot NU 20-2, but succumb 2-1

By JEFF CROFTS

JOSH REYNOLDS/COLLEGIAN
The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team lost a tough one yesterday 2-1 at the hands of Northeastern University.

As the old saying goes, it's quality not quantity that counts.

That is what the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team found out Monday night in Ludlow as they dropped a 2-1 decision to Northeastern University despite outshooting the Huskies by a wide margin.

With the defeat UMass' record fell to 6-3-1 while Northeastern improved to 4-6.

The Minutemen were able to control the game play and had 20 shots (8 on goal) while limiting Northeastern to a mere 2. However, those two shots were all the Huskies would need as both were able to scoot by UMass goaltender Mark Wolf and find net.

In the early going, things were pretty quiet, with UMass keeping control of the ball and not allowing Northeastern to pose a threat. While Northeastern wasn't able to get a shot on net, the Minutemen were not able to cash in on the chances they did have, and this would come back to haunt them.

This scenario would all change at the 16:06 mark when Northeastern would get on the board on their first shot.

Freshman midfielder Matt Cameron collected a pass from fellow freshman Kevin Smith, and beat Wolf to give the Huskies the 1-0 lead. This would not be the last UMass would hear from this tandem on the night.

The game remained 1-0 as the halftime whistle sounded. Coming out of the gates in the second half it was the same story.

The Minutemen would continue to press the action, but were denied by Huskie goalie, freshman Randy Spencer, on the shots they did get.

It remained this way until the Huskie tag team of Cameron and Smith hitched together again and scored to give the Huskies a 2-0 lead. Again, it was Smith who set up Cameron, who in turn beat Wolf for the goal.

The Minutemen, however, would not fold that easily. Junior forward Randy Jacobs took a pass from junior defenseman Matt Edgerly and blew one by Spencer to cut the deficit in half to 2-1.

However, the final gun sounded before UMass could complete their comeback, and Northeastern walked off the field with the victory.

Game Notes: Jacobs is now tied with Justin Edelman for the team lead with 15 points. Up next for the Minutemen is a crucial Atlantic 10 battle on Friday night at West Virginia. UMass has outscored their opponents 27-13 overall.

Yankee Conference notebook

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

Missing: One football team. Last seen in Durham, NH. Defending Yankee Conference champions, wearing blue jerseys and white helmets with UNH inscribed on them.

The Wildcats are hurting, and hurting bad. Off to an 0-3 YanCon start, Bill Bowes' men are all but finished in the race for the Beanpot, an award many figured UNH to battle Villanova and Delaware for until seasons' end.

UNH fell at home to YanCon frontrunner Delaware 42-22 last weekend, knocking the 'Cats into sole possession of the YanCon basement.

More importantly UNH lost the services of All-American tailback Barry Bourassa (sprained hip) last week versus Delaware, and will not play this weekend versus Richmond.

Richmond is the surprise team of this year's YanCon race, sitting just one half game behind the leaders.

Jim Marshall's Spiders are 2-1 (3-1 overall), with impressive wins over Maine and Rhode Island.

Greg Lilly (YanCon offensive player of the week) is putting big numbers up on the board for the Spiders (51-78-1000-1), who have outscored opponents 156-96 thusfar in '92.

"He's just playing great," said Bowes. "The passes he's throwing are basically undefensible."

Even with Lilly and the Richmond offense putting impressive numbers on the board, the Spider defense has been the big surprise of the '92 campaign.

Richmond let up an average of 477.1 yards-per-game last season, and has improved that to 403.5 this year.

Leading the Spider defense is senior co-captain Eric Johnson, who leads the YanCon in total tackles with 57.

The reason for the rejuvenated Richmond defense according to UNH headman Bowes, is all to familiar to Minuteman fans.

"They're [Richmond] playing really aggressive, fired-up defense down there," said Bowes. "I've got to believe that their defensive improvement has to do with the prescence of Jim Reid."

UMass will get their chance to visit with Marshall, Reid and the Spiders on Nov. 7th, when the Minutemen travel to Virginia for what should prove to be a pivotal game in the YanCon race.

This weekend UMass travels to Kingston, RI to take on URI, a team which has struggled through the first four games of the '92 season with a 1-3 (0-2 YanCon) record.

Look for the the Minuteman offense to come alive against the Rams, a team which is dead last in the YanCon in yards allowed.

"This is a really big game," said UMass head coach Mike Hodges. "We don't want that second conference loss, and our team is treating this game as if it was a playoff game."

The Minutemen sit in the middle of the YanCon standings with a 1-1 record, and a win over Rhode Island would bring Hodges and company back to Amherst for a three game homestand riding a three game winning streak.

"We've been on the road three out of our first four," Hodges said. "It will awfully nice to come home for three, especially if we're 3-1.

YanCon Awards: Offensive-Player-of-the-Week awards went to Lilly, who bacame the YanCon's first repeat winner this season.

Defensive-Player-of-the-Week honors go to Delaware's hard-hitting All-American free safety Warren Mcintire, who keyed the Blue Hen defense in a 42-22 stomping of UNH.

Wilbur Gilliard of UConn snagged Rookie-of-the-week honors, running wild over the Yale defense for 198 yards, as the Huskies improved to 2-2 on the year.

At halfway point, field hockey rolling right along

The UMass field hockey team is ranked fourth in the nation in this week's NCAA poll.

Most teams do not accomplish everything they set out to do after only half a season, but the University of Massachusetts field hockey team pretty much has.

With 11 regular season games down and eight to go, the Minutewomen sport a 10-1 record and are currently ranked fourth in the nation and first in New England. They have improved markedly from last season, gelling as a team and not overlooking any of their opponents.

But as head coach Pam Hixon will tell you if you ask her, there is still a long way to go. The home stretch is where UMass faltered last year, losing games to unranked teams such as Delaware and more or less stumbling into the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

A strong A-10 tourney last year, despite a 1-0 loss to Temple University in the final, helped the Minutewomen grab an at-large bid in the NCAAs. This year, the Minutewomen have been a more composed team, strengthened by the leadership of people like senior Joy Blenis.

Blenis, a senior from Windham, NH, was named A-10 Defensive Player of the Week. She plays the official position of center back for the Minutewomen, but is frequently seen all over the field. The reason? Hixon primarily uses Blenis to mark, or shadow, the toughest forward on the opponent's team.

Blenis anchored the defense last week,

Protesters occuping Memorial Hall look out on the crowd gathered below.

The occupation of the Memorial Building by 11 students to protest the celebration of Columbus Day and the treatment of women of color is still continuing as of last night although the administration is considering punitive action.

The group of 11, made up of University undergraduates and graduate students and also alumni, are demanding the replacement of Columbus Day with a commemorative teach-in, 40 full scholarships for low-income women of color and the funding of an academic program to support these women.

The University "will not negotiate with anyone under the condition of illegal occupancy," Chancellor Richard O'Brien said last night.

"We have to look at our options hour-by-hour," O'Brien said. "I have not had any formal notification about the terms [set by the protestors]."

"The issue is simple: society ignores issues of women of color. They are denied the chance for education that most others in the society have," stated Henry Theriault, a graduate student among the 11 occupying the building, in a prepared statement to the Collegian, "UMass must take a step to change this. UMass must provide 40 scholarships for low-income women."

Quynh Dang, an alumnus and one of the demonstrators, stated in a prepared statement, "Cultural Centers, academic support services and student organizations do not address issues of violence and the Everywoman's Center is not sufficient to meet the needs of women of color."

She said, "We are going to stay in here until the University makes good on its professed commitment to multiculturalism and the ending of racism."

Attack suspect told to stay off UM property

Police have ordered the suspect in the attack on resident assistant Arlens Barosy in Washington Tower to stay off the University's campus, according to a University staff member.

The University will seek assault and battery charges against the alleged assailant, said Danny Chun of the University's News Office. Police are currently investigating to see if the alleged attacker, who is not a University student, had any connection with the racial epithets sprawled with marker throughout the 17th floor of Washington Tower.

"There has been a lots of support for the resident assistant. This includes University and other groups," Southwest/South area coordinator Linda Keith said.

Washington residents and staff expressed outrage at the two incidents happening over the weekend. Many students said they wanted to catch the those involved with the racial slurs.

At the entrance of Washington, two large petitions protesting the graffiti were filled with signatures.

On Tuesday, however, a poster in the lobby advertising an Asian American program was defaced with a racial slur. Police are currently investigating the situation.

"I wish this stuff would quit. It is a pretty good floor," said Steve Melanson, a senior political science major.

Washington Residence Director Norman Hiza and Keith sent out a support letter Tuesday to Washington residents asking students to attend

UM faces investigation

Physical education probe continues

By EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — A House committee referred its investigation into wrongdoing at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst's School of Physical Education to the state attorney general Wednesday, citing potential criminal wrongdoing.

The House Post Audit and Oversight Committee members refused to discuss details of the allegations or to say who is involved, saying they do not want to compromise any potential criminal investigation. The probe involves several people, and could go beyond the university, they said.

Thomas Hammond, who heads the investigations for the committee said the potential allegations could include, "a whole host of things, including potential tax problems."

Hammond's inquiry involved interviews with more than 70 people and an evaluation of more than 50,000 documents received in response to subpoenas and letters of request. But Hammond said the investigation ran into some stumbling blocks.

"There were a number of subpoenas that did not get responded to in the spirit of cooperation that they were issued," he said.

The difficulty with getting some people to comply with subpoenas combined with questions about the statute of limitation on some matters prompted Hammond to recommend that the committee turn over the inquiry to Attorney General Scott Harshbarger's office.

The alleged spending abuses in the university sports programs have also been probed by a university administrator, Provost Glen Gordon. Gordon failed to respond to requests for comment.

Legislators began their inquiry after football and other alumni, angered by the resignation of football coach Jim Reid in January, demanded an accounting of funds. Reid quit over cuts in his scholarship program.

David Bischoff, former dean of the School of Physical Education, stepped down in July, accusing his critics of conducting a "witch hunt."

Bischoff had requested a chance to appear before the committee. His attorney, James Collins, said Bischoff was never subpoenaed by the committee or its investigators.

"Dave Bischoff looks forward to cooperating with the attorney general as his office determines whether to investigate this matter," Collins said.

"We have no idea what evidence they're giving, if any, or what the allegations are, if any," Collins said.

Hammond said he will no longer continue with his inquiry now that the committee has referred the matter to Harshbarger's office.

In an interim report on his findings, Hammond noted several areas that need improvement. There is no consistent oversight of travel by school employees in the school of physical education, according to the report. The report also criticized the budgeting practicing of the physical education school, saying funds were juggled between accounts on an almost daily basis.

The attorney general's office had little comment on the committee's decision. "As soon as we do see it, our office will review it to see what action, if any, will be appropriate for us to take," said Kim Hinden, of the attorney general's office. "That's all I can say at this point."

GLB students seek safe space through corridor

By JASON McDONALD
Collegian Staff

After many years of struggle by GLB students and faculty the "Two In Twenty Corridor," a program for lesbian, gay and bisexual students, began its first semester in Mary Lyons Residence Hall this fall.

Designed as a safe and nonthreatening living space for GLB students, the corridor hopes to eliminate much of the feelings of isolation felt by gay men, lesbians, and bisexuals on campus, according to residents.

"I don't want to have to fight for who I am," said Tony, a resident of the floor. "I'm here to get an education — I don't want to have to waste my time with people that are small minded."

The floor is not limited to gay men, lesbians and Bisexuals. Allies, or students who support the needs of gay, lesbian and bisexual students, are taking a major part in supporting the corridor and its residents.

"It's a corridor, but it's become a whole building experience as more and more people come out as allies and get involved," said Carol Carlson, the Residence Director of the Crabtree/Mary Lyons cluster.

The purpose and structure of the corridor will be decided by the residents. Future plans may include a class and possibly an entire floor for gay, lesbian and bisexual students.

Due to a lower turnout than was originally expected, Two in Twenty's orignal plan for an entire floor was reduced to a corridor. The residents hope that with greater publicity, the floor will continue to expand.

As well as providing safety, the floor also serves as a unique opportunity for interaction between GLB students on campus.

"I saw the floor as an opportunity to better integrate into the GLB commu-

NE deposits in jeopardy

BOSTON (AP) — More than $1.2 billion in uninsured banks across the country, including more than $100 million in seven New England banks, reportedly could be lost in a coming wave of bank failures.

Nationwide, 60 to 80 banks are in danger of seizure by regulators because they fail to meet strict financial standards that go into effect in December, the Boston Globe reported Wednesday.

Up to 50 other banks, as well as 300 savings and loans, with billions more in uninsured deposits, also may be in danger because depositors have accounts or certificates worth more than $100,000.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. protects accounts up to that amount at failed banks. Anything beyond that is subject to seizure unless it is covered by a private deposit insurer.

"Some people just don't learn," said Warren Heller, research director of Veribanc Inc. of Wakefield, a bank rating and research firm. "With all that we've been through, it's a shame that folks still don't recognize the fairly obvious risks of having more than $100,000 in near-defunct institutions."

A study by Heller indicated there are 107 banks in 28 states that already fail the new standards or are stuck in a downward spiral, the Globe said.

New England banks at greatest risk, according to Heller, are Guaranty First

Fisher replaces Magic Johnson on AIDS staff

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush today appointed Mary D. Fisher, a carrier of the virus that causes AIDS, to the National Commission on AIDS, replacing basketball star Magic Johnson, who resigned the position last month in protest.

Bush met privately with Ms. Fisher in the White House this morning.

Ms. Fisher, 44, of Boca Raton, Fla., is an artist and a mother of two.

She contracted the virus that causes AIDS from her infected former husband. Her father, Max Fisher, is honorary chairman of the Bush-Quayle '92 National Finance Committee.

Ms. Fisher gained national renown for making a speech to the Republican National Convention in which she pleaded for tolerance toward people with AIDS and said the administration needed to do more to combat the disease.

"I'm putting myself in a position and in a situation where I'm trying to do the best I can do," she told reporters after meeting with Bush today.

She said she did not discuss the commission's business with Bush.

Dispute erupts over Russian arms removal

By SERGEI SHARGORODSKY

TBILISI, Georgia — Russia has begun removing weapons and ammunition from Georgia, where the government is trying to seize the material for its battle with Abkhazian separatists, Georgian officials said today.

Georgian military officials in Sukhumi said they were expecting an attack by the separatists on the city of 150,000 people. Georgian troops captured the city, the Abkhazian capital, in August.

Abkhazian forces have scored key military victories in the past five days, pushing Georgian troops out of northwestern Abkhazia, according to reports from the breakaway region.

Tensions have been increasing between Russia and Georgia in recent days over the 6-week-old conflict in Abkhazia. On Tuesday, President Boris Yeltsin said Russian troops were taking full contol of the main railway in Abkhazian territory, as well as the coastline.

UMass policy receives criticism

PORTLAND, Maine (AP) — A flier distributed by opponents of Portland's gay-rights ordinance has drawn the University of Massachusetts into the the fracas over a city-wide referendum on the law.

The flier claims the university's Amherst campus revised its non-discrimination code to protect pedophiles — adults who have abnormal sexual desires for children — but the university says that's not true.

Supporters of Concerned Portland Citizens, a group attempting to repeal Portland's gay rights ordinance, have been distributing the flier. It implies that gay rights laws protect pedophiles and is listed as a reason voters should repeal the city ordinance in a Nov. 3 referendum.

University of Massachusetts spokesman Danny Chun said the university's lawyers two years ago inserted a clause into its anti-discrimination policy that specifically excluded pedophiles. Last year, university trustees dropped the language out of concern that it implied only gay people molest children.

Chun said the elimination of the pedophilia clause does not mean the school endorses the practice and noted that child molestation is a crime.

Confusion over the removal of the clause prompted one nationally syndicated radio talk show host the criticize the university over the summer. Gay rights opponents in Tampa, Fla., recently misinterpreted the university policy decision in the same way as Concerned Portland Citizens, he added.

"Basically what we've been doing all along is to set the record straight. . . We never protected pedophiles," Chun said.

Portland's gay rights ordinance was adopted by the city council earlier this year, but it has never been implemented because opponents filed petitions that forced next month's referendum.

James Duran, the leader of Concerned Portland Citizens, could not immediately be reached this morning. A call to his home was not answered.

North Adams tipping too many Sam Adams'

At North Adams State College student arrests while "under the influence" is sparking concern from college and community officials.

According to The Beacon, NASC's student newspaper, during the first three weeks of the Fall 1992 semester there were four arrests, which is an increase from past years, due to irresponsible drinking, according to city and campus officials.

The arrests included a fight incited by a man videotaping two intoxicated students being placed under protective custody.

"It wasn't any brawl," said Director of Campus Police John Dilego. "A couple of people had a disagreement with the taping." Dilego said that when a voice asked the man to stop taping and he didn't, he was knocked down. He said 100-150 students gathered at the scene at that point.

The most recent arrest occurred when police confiscated two kegs of beer and arrested a college visitor for buying beer for minors.

According to North Adams Mayor John Barrett III, the increase in trouble is because of "how much drinking there is at NASC."

"The amount of drinking on and off campus has increased dramatically, as well as the problems caused by drinking," said Barrett.

With comments like those Barrett could be a shoe-in for election in Amherst.

I Got You, Babe

According to The State News, Michigan StateUniversity's student paper, a man masturbated in front of a 25-year-old woman in a parking lot.

The victim, was walking back to her car after getting lunch. She noticed a car parked very close to hers. The car, a 1984 Chevrolet Caprice, was backed into the metered space and a man was sitting in the car.

Police said as the woman tried to open her car door without hitting the blue Chevy, a man sitting inside said, "Hey baby, you're hot."

The woman saw the man masturbating and then he drove off, police said.

The woman obtained the license plate number of the car and then walked directly to the East Lansing police station. She described him as a white male in his 20s, 220 pounds with brown hair.

Police said the case should be resolved soon.

Ugly profs put on a funny face

Purdue University's chapter of Alpha Phi Omega just wrapped up its "Ugliest Man on Campus" biannual fund raising effort.

This year the contest was run a bit differently than in the past, featuring contestants that are professors on campus as opposed to campus celebrities, as the group had used in the past.

"Typically we have run the event with people like Jim Colletto and Purdue President Steven Beering," said Kristin Konn, charity fund-raising co-chair. "But this year we wanted to use people that were more in touch with the students and more willing to make a funny face — before we had to rely on press pictures."

Konn said finding professors willing to participate was the most difficult aspect of organizing the event.

"A lot of professors didn't want to participate, though, because they were worried about marring their professional reputation," Konn said.

The candidates for the national service fraternity's event will be indirectly responsible for acquiring money on behalf of the Lafayette Urban Ministry homeless shelter.

Students can vote by placing money in jars with the corresponding professor's face on it, kind of a spin on the Chippendale technique. The winner will be determined by the amount of money totaled up in each jar.

UM leads health alliance

Teams with local groups to improve public welfare

By University News Office

The University of Massachusetts Schools of Public Health is teaming up with agencies and community groups in central and western Massachusetts in an innovative project aimed at fighting AIDS, substance abuse, teen pregnancy and domestic violence.

In addition, the alliance will encourage minority and disadvantaged youth to pursue careers in public health.

The project is funded by a $2.25 million grant from the private Kellogg Foundation of Battle Creek, Michigan.

The foundation selected only seven consortiums throughout the country out of 112 applicants for its $16 million public health initiative designed to encourage community-based organizations to work with schools and local health departments to improve public heath.

Joining the School of Public Health and the community groups in the project are: the University of Massachusetts Medical School in Worcester; Massachusetts Area Health Education Centers, which promote community-based health education programs; and the Massachusetts Association of Health Boards.

Kellogg Foundation program director Dr. Thomas Bruce says the Massachusetts project was selected because of its strong, all-around proposal.

"One of the proposal's strengths is its community focus, targeting both rural and urban areas and an intersting mix of racial, ethnic and cultural groups," said Bruce. "The project has the potential to be a model for other parts of the country."

"There is concern on the national level that educational institutions do more work with communities to take on serious public health problems," says Stephen Gehlbach, dean of the School of Public Health. "This project gives us an opportunity to work at the grassroots level to determine what communities think."

For the past year, University faculty members and health and human service providers from the participating communities have attended seminars held across the country by the Kellogg Foundation to discuss the challenges of developing community-based public health programs.

Also, community groups have been meeting to discuss their public health needs and ways of forming an effective, on-going relationship with the School of Public Health to deal with those needs.

Public health faculty members David Buchanan, Gary Moore, Paula Stamps and Shlomo Barnoon are working on the project.

"It's a crucial time in public health because there is so much concern about our health care system," said Buchanan. "Many people recognize that we can no longer afford to pay for this treatment system. We have to move toward prevention of problems."

Buchanan said getting faculty and students out of the classroom and into the community will improve the work and training in the School of Public Health. "We can tap the front-line experiences of communities and learn firsthand abou the public health problems they faces in the trenches," said Buchanan.

SGA elections produce crop of new senators

The voter turnout for the Student Government Association's elections last Tuesday, was average compared to past years, but election day went very smoothly, according to the SGA's Chair of Governmental Affairs.

The elections started on time, all the ballot boxes were covered and the SGA finished counting the votes by 10:30 p.m., said junior Jon Aronson.

He said the voter turnout was not more than expected, but it wasn't horrible. "Enough students voted to show that there is a concern on campus about student issues," said Aronson.

The Greek area had the lowest voter turnout, while the Sylvan residence area had the highest. "The students who won did, by far, the most successful write-in campaign I have ever seen," said Aronson.

Aronson said the campaigners stood outside the Worcester Dining Commons and handed out stickers with the names of the students running for offices in the Sylvan area government to voters.

EWC services seen unequal in poll results

By JOY GOLDSMITH
Collegian Correspondent

Students responding to a recent Collegian survey said they perceive a significant difference along racial lines in the accessibility of services offered at the Everywoman's Center.

Many women of color surveyed say they are not aware of or are dissatisfied with the services offered. The questionnaire, distributed Monday in the Campus Center and Student Union, asked women if they have ever used the services at the Everywoman's Center. If respondents hadn't, then they were asked to give reasons.

All the White respondents who had used the EWC were satisfied with the services they received, writing such comments as "good counseling" and "welcoming place to go."

Although many women of color said they had positive experiences at the EWC, 36 percent said they did not.

Columbus screwed up, but so what? He's still dead

When my best friend's dad was in college in the '50s, he and his drinking buddies had this drinking song about Christopher Columbus. The chorus went something like this:

"He knew the earth was round, he knew it could be found,

That mathematical, geographical, son of a bitch Columbo."

Ha! And you though P.C. was new!

So Christopher Columbus isn't a hero anymore. He's a reprobate, an imperialist, an enslaver, a murderer. His accidental arrival in the New World brought suffering and death to the indigenous peoples of the Western Hemisphere, and by extension, he was therefore responsible for the enslavement of millions of African men and women. His "discovery" still affects us today.

But there's one detail about Columbus we've left out: He's still dead. That's right, dead. Pushing up daisies. Gone to that big Santa Maria in the sky.

So what's the big deal? Hindsight is 20/20, and in retrospect it's easy to see the colonialism of the past was greedy and wrong-minded. But at the same time, does bashing the guy solve anything? Can we jump back in time, Quantum Leap-style, and turn those boats around?

Even if we could, is there any doubt that another "explorer" after him wouldn't do worse? Cortez, Pizzaro, Drake, Cabot, Vespucci, De Soto, Cap'n Crunch — any one of them could have held Columbus' title as history's best-known imperialist, had Columbo fallen off the edge of the Earth (it's flat, you know) or been run over in a DWI accident by the good ship Exxon Valdez.

Greg
SUKIENNIK

Point being, it was bound to happen sooner or later. Someone was going to bump into this huge land mass halfway between China and Portugal and ruin the rich civilizations there. Sad, but true. Before jumping down Columbus' throat, remember the historical context he lived in, and understand neither he nor anyone else saw this as a mistake of epic proportions. Exploration and conquest, in the name of God and country, was the name of the game, and like it or not we're left to pick up the pieces.

Which brings us right back to present day. Why is Columbus Day a holiday? Not for Columbus' sake, that's for sure. If you asked 100 people how they spent their day off from work or school, I doubt you could find one who'd reply "I'm celebrating Columbus." Most of us now know he had as much to do with "discovering" this place as Joe Bob Briggs did.

The world Columbus lived and its values are 500 years down the drain. He's dead. Ferdinand and Isabella are dead. The effects of his voyage on the map may still be felt today, but not in the same context and not with the same immediacy. Equating American foriegn policy with 15th Century European colonialism is like comparing tofu with a Whopper with cheese — you can't. They're two different animals driven by two different sets of values and motivations. And one tastes like modeling clay.

Columbus is a hard guy to figure out, partly because the real person he was (or might've been) has been obscured by history, legend and whatnot. Scholars still aren't sure just exactly who he was. What he is now is a symbol. Who knows what he felt about the New World, or enslaving people, or perpetuating colonialism for another 500 years. If we can't see the future in front of our nose, do you think he could?

What Columbus was into was gold. He sailed under the Spanish flag not because he was Spanish, but because they paid him. He was hoping to find a western route to the East, not a potential sugar cane colony ripe for exploitation. He probably had no idea his discoveries, or his actions afterwards, would have such drastic, mind-bending effects. He was a sailor. How much more simple can you get?

When Columbus died, by most accounts, he died penniless and depressed. Let the man rest in peace, already.

Don't get tied to parties

This November, we, the people of UMass, as well as the rest of these United States, are asked to make a decision that will affect the future of millions. When it comes to choosing a political candidate, some people would rather not vote at all than make a choice.

Arthur
STAPLETON

Well, I'm in that position when it comes to a political party. I haven't grown up as a Republican, Democrat or Independent, (excuse me if I left any other meaningless categories of political geniuses out) nor do I claim that I am in any of these now.

People assume if I want to vote for Bill Clinton that I'm a Democrat. No, sorry, but I won't classify myself as part of any party. I think these parties are just shields that weak-minded politicians hide behind to evade pertinent issues in this country.

For example, Republican Vice President Dan Quayle is one of these many people who hide behind the so-called party platform. He coincides with his party by claiming he is pro-life, but when asked what he would think if his daughter wanted to get an abortion, he said he would stand by her.

Don't you think, Mr. Quayle, that you overstepped your party's platform when you said that. Well, I say to you, get a backbone and stand up for what you believe in, not what your Republican peers believe, or say they do.

I was taught by my parents (yes, Quayle, your family values) that I should be an individual, and think for myself, instead of adopting the policies of others as mine without question.

After a summer of watching those galas called conventions, I came to the conclusion that these stereotypes that derive from political parties are not good for young adults that are just entering the "real world."

Stereotyping is what causes all of the problems in today's society, so what makes it O.K. to use them when it comes to politics.

I remember telling a friend back home that I was going to vote for Clinton. He remarked, "Oh, no, you're a Democrat? Remember the last time one of them was in office."

To tell you the truth, I don't, and it doesn't matter to me that George Bush is a Republican. The job he has done has been mediocre where I'm concerned and I'll vote for a person because of their plan of attack, not what party the candidate poorly represents.

Furthermore, there is nothing wrong with agreeing with some views of the other party. There is a die-hard Republican that you read every Friday on this page whom I consider a good friend.

We may not see eye-to-eye on certain issues, but that does not stop me from listening and learning about other views.

Case in point: if there are so-called Democrats that won't vote for Bush because he's of another party, swallow your pride and cast the vote for the person you agree with most.

Furthermore, you so-called Republicans out there who like Gov. Clinton's tax plan as well as his views on education, leave your clan and vote for the next President of the United States.

Racism: writing is on the wall

I just want to say three things in response to the article "RA target of racial attack [Collegian, Oct. 5]." There is no sense in going into all the reasons why racism exists and arguing that it is inhumane and unjust — that is apparent and has been proven and discussed more times than I can count.

First, I would like to reply to the white students in my classes who often try to persuade me that the struggle is over and racism does not exist. The writing is figuratively and literally on the wall.

Secondly, I am going to fight this and I want the Black community to know that we should not tolerate this and there is nothing wrong with making a little noise. The more we become passive the more these situations will occur.

And lastly gentlemen (I use the term loosely) — learn how to spell: your ignorance is showing, in more ways than one.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

Notes from the Campus Center Basement, it's like an old glove with me. Fits perfect, full of holes.

The vice-presidential debate, whoa. "Dan Quayle versus Al Gore," should resemble those "Trials of Life" videos. You know the series I'm talking about. They're advertised late at night with footage of killer whales tearing up seals. Clap your flippers and bark, Danny Boy.

I hate crossword puzzles. The clue is "Papal vestment" and "the Pope's funny hat" doesn't fit.

Now and again you have to wonder what life is like for the infamous Collegian columnist Michael Morrissey. He says he gets a few funny looks in classes now and then, usually when attendance is called at the beginning of the semester. "When my name is called for attendance, I hold my hand high and my head low," he says. "I'm here!"

I heard the University's loudest alumnus, Guy Glodis, got the democratic nomination for Worcester's state legislative seat. To fill in for all you young-un's out there, Guy (yes that's his real name) was one of the few, but most "outspoken," UMass conservatives. His speciality was getting people's attention. He and his playmates ran the Minuteman, held "Straight Pride" rallies, held Morton Downey Jr.-style talk shows in the Campus Center Auditorium, and said the Pledge of Allegiance with much volume during student senate meetings. All his success in the democratic primary confirms my belief that electoral and political victory hinges on nothing more than making more noise than the other guy. Doesn't matter what you say, just say it loud. Vote for me, I'll say lots of outlandish things to keep you from getting bored.

Marc
ELLIOTT

While I'm on the subject of bent campus personalities, what is GEO's social chair Peter Underdown smoking? If he's bored I'd suggest needlepoint. Anyone catch his diatribe on the Collegian in the Grad Voice? It was an interesting experiment in one-sided journalism to be sure. More inaccuracies than Yugoslavia's had cease-fires. Funny Pete, I've talked to a few people down here in the basement and none of them remember talking to you at all. I wonder if maybe you neglected to get all sides of the story? You certainly didn't identify your sources — ethically, that's bad. I'd be a little more careful there guy. Ever see the movie "Libel Suit?" It could be coming to a theater near you. Since then another Grad Voice has been published. It seems graduate students, or at least those on the Voice staff, are no longer content with grading our papers. Now they want to grade our humanity as well. I don't suppose I'll be let off with a D-minus do you?

Just to be fair, maybe I'll mention a few administrators next time.

Happy thought for the day: Only buy the smaller clothes detergent containers. You could die tomorrow and all that soap would go to waste.

Ross Perot suffers from the Dukakis electoral disease, shortness. 'Course, Perot could always stand on his checkbook to reach the debate podium.

Of all the buildings on campus, why Memorial Hall? Yeah, let's shut down the Telefund man. That'll hurt 'em.

A trip to the supermarket these days'll clean you out, sort of like D.C. food.

Why do people find it necessary to say they favor world peace or an end to world hunger? Isn't it a given? I haven't see many "I hope they starve" bumper stickers lately.

Does anyone else find it disgusting that Congress will only override a presidential veto to regulate cable television? I guess the family leave legislation isn't as important as Cinemax.

Rush week disappoints

As a transfer student at UMass I thought joining a fraternity would be a great way to meet people. Pledging, brotherhood, exchanges, date parties, formals and most of all philanthropies. I always associated the college experience with Greek life.

Adam Scott
ROBERTS

I want to set the record straight: this is not a fraternity-bashing editorial. Instead this is my feeling about rushing. Informal rush allowed me to decide which houses I thought I would have liked to join. I easily narrowed it to three. One I never really liked, but I kept an open mind. The brothers there never took the time to get to know the rushees. My second option I never bothered checking out further because I liked my third option.

From the moment I stepped on their porch the brothers greeted me and were very friendly. I had a good gut feeling about this house because each brother took the time to talk to me. I attended all of their rush events and really enjoyed myself. In a way I screwed myself by putting all my eggs in one basket: if I did go Greek it was going to be this house.

I felt part of a group for the first time in my life. I went to bed a few times with my adrenalin running faster than Bill Rogers. But then I said, "Wait! Don't get excited. If they take me great! I'll be thrilled and will give the house my all! If not, then they can't be blessed with my brotherhood."

After three weeks of waiting to see if I got a bid, nothing happened. I figured no news was good news. Friends and aquaintances of mine all reassured me, "Oh, you'll get in," or "They must like you, I put in a good word for you." Great! But, if I got in I wanted it to be because they liked me not because someone told them to like me.

Finally, the news was broken to me. I felt relieved and not upset. I thought, "Look, I could either feel sorry for myself or sorry for the house because they lost a great guy." I didn't lose a moment's rest over it. I have no animosity towards anyone in this house and I would hope that if they ran into me at the Campus Center they would still stop to say hi. So far, I have seen a few guys from that house and they are still the great guys that I thought they were.

The only thing that bothered me was the idea of being judged. Is that what constitutes getting a bid? How could people actually know who I am from a few gatherings after classes? Was I judged because of the image I portrayed to the brothers? I could have been fake and there would have been no way that they would of known who I really am. I'm glad that I didn't change myself, my image, or my opinions to get into a fraternity.

Someone once told me "Being in a fraternity is a privilege and not a right." I understand this but in a way I don't like it. I realized that we are all in a fraternity, the "Fraternity of Life." This fraternity is our nuclear family, the one group that we automatically belong to. You don't need a bid to be a part of it, your just born into it. Your letters are your last name. We should all be proud of who we are, and where we came from, our roots. And that, my friends, is a fraternity.

Forget Clinton, vote Bush

I'm going to be political. I hate politics. I try to avoid politics. It's like Charles Bukowski said: politics is like trying to screw a cat. But it is an election year, and no matter how much I drink I can't stop the mindless banter of political hacks and junkies. So I've decided to become a political hack.

Chris J.
PETROPOULOS

I assume that most of you fishhead boys and fishhead girls are going to vote for Bill Clinton. What follows is an issue by issue analysis outlining why you should all vote for George Bush.

Abortion: This is not even an issue. Abortion is legal now and always will be. No supreme court will ever overturn Roe v. Wade, no matter what Bush and thousands of God-fearing redneck oafs do in their spare time. Let them have their fun protesting clinics. Vote for Bush.

The environment: Save someone's job. Kill an environmentalist. Vote for Bush.

Women's issues: This is supposed to be the political "year of the woman." This issue presents problems: while Bush's record is mediocre, it's clear Clinton likes women. He likes a lot of women. He likes a lot of women an awful lot. If you want Clinton to like you, vote for him. If you want a better president, vote for Bush.

Racial issues: Another very sensitive area. Once again Bush has done neither anything spectacular nor anything outright deplorable. On the other hand, everyone knows that Clinton is an evil, unrestrained, unthinking bigot. He hates any white, black, red, yellow, gay, straight or living person who makes between $60,000 and $180,000 dollars a year, especially if these people own or operate their own small business. He will, if elected, seize these people's shops, factories and offices and herd them into dead-end jobs in the public sector. Vote for Bush.

Drugs: Let's face it, we all scream for Ibogaine, but do you want someone who thinks we'll believe he didn't inhale in the White House? What will he do in an international crisis, bluff the enemy or the disputing parties into submission? Besides, sooner or later drugs are going to be legalized. I don't think it will be Bush who makes the daring move, but it is going to be a Republican who finally realizes the huge industry we're missing out on. Probably Quayle, when he gets elected in 1996. Vote for Bush.

The economy: Everything the Democrats are blaming Bush for is the fault of the Democratic-controlled Congress. They, thanks to the Constitution, control all spending. Even the most evil schemes for deadly weaponry at amazing prices proposed by Reagan or Bush had to be approved by them. The economy exists independent of what any president wants to do to it. If Clinton gets elected, you, the college student, will have less opportunity to gain personal wealth in the next four years. If Bush is re-elected, we all have a better chance of being rich. Vote for Bush.

Foreign affairs: No one seems to be talking about this area this year. Vote for Bush.

That settles that. I hope to see you all at the polls and to see even more of you at the local Bush/Quayle victory party, where we'll down red wine, burn Murphy Brown in effigy and dance the night away while firing our guns randomly.

Chris J. Petropoulos is a UMass student.

Division isn't a solution

Iconoclastic, extremist attitudes have permeated our newspapers, cultural programs and schools of social and critical thought.

"The Quincentennial: Columbus Day Revised" has sparked much debate among various scholars and has led many into thinking that all acts associated with this day are a betrayal of those slaughtered, tortured and raped by the conquistadors in pursuit of control and exploitation.

Kenneth
MAISONET

I do not presume to be an authority on colonialism nor do I wish to defend the historical subjugation and cultural eradication by the colonial elite. As a Puerto Rican Internationalist my country's own colonial socio-political history serves as a constant reminder.

Not balancing the perspectives and attitudes are undermining the positive historical advancements made through the centuries by pioneers, inventors and scientists who have contributed to the world.

We continue to see a dividing and dangerous paradigm recreate itself within the context of oppression, redefining and rewriting American history. The history of America is a culmination of actors and sympathizers who actively engaged themselves to forge a better world. The U.S. Constitution, Bill of Rights and Civil Rights Bill were measures needed to insure that this nation did not become a monopoly of territorial, cultural kings of oppression. Although we see progress stagnated at various levels — the human spirit has not been silenced — history bears a constant witness to this account.

The principles and standards set forth were and still are the foundation of what keeps this nation functional and sustainable. This country has sent out many delegates and ambassadors who have had a positive impact on a global scale, pushing for human rights and raising the consciousness of the American people. America still stands at the forefront of democracy. Truly the age of cynicism has come to fruition. People from all walks of life are still loving, caring, growing, learning and bearing each others' burdens, still aspiring to make the best of their situation and time by pursuing education and participating constructively in positive social change. This continues in the country we call America.

This is what we fail to see, despite the permissiveness of the spirit dimension, and the unaccountability of certain individuals not willing to admit that this is a reality. It is disheartening to see so many bright students take a stand on something they are vaguely sure is correct in itself. The notion that women of color must demand more attention by the educational establishment is to say that nothing is being done across the board. This is inaccurate, another example of misinformation and distortion of facts. Women of color are moving up, fortifying the bonds within the system.

The question needs to be asked: what are the men of color doing to address the issue of violence perpetuated within their own culture? Men of color set the tone for how other men perceive women. They act as models for younger males and reinforce certain attitudes about women in their respective cultures. This is entirely left out of the picture. Another contradiction. To eliminate sound, historical, empirical foundations rooted within the soil of the country's history would be a disgrace, disadvantageous to students, parents and future generations to come. What model will replace such rich, often misinterpreted history?

Can we account as a whole for what has been done by the breed called Greed? Does the entire white population, including students at UMass, fall under judgement for past and future atrocities? Most certainly not! This divisive mentality will remain as such because it fails to acknowledge the imperfections within its own culture and histories, their own shortcomings.

They seek to discard what is good in American history and blame innocent citizens of outright genocide. This is wrong and a falsity. They do not take responsibility for not being well-organized, structured and accountable to their own people and impacting the future generation. They have had ample opportunity to make positive, lasting change.

Their own individuality and cultural pride has limited the global humanistic efforts to understand and participate in this country's history. There is always the scapegoat slogans of the day such as "S/he's racist and white" or "they're privileged, they can't possibly understand" or "they're closed minded." These are just a few examples of how this prevalent mentality divides and continues to see life and other people.

People never move beyond this stage even with a good education. It only affords resentment, hostility, bitterness and goes further by becoming exclusive and separatist in its actions. This attitude will never make any real change.

We as students must continually question the motives and agenda of those who wish to revise U.S. history-victimology and who see the entire role of American history as racist in origin. This is not factual and an untruth.

There is more to learn about America than meets the eye.

White students must take action

How many people have to be physically assaulted? How much graffiti and vandalism will it take? When are white students on campus going to realize that the problems of racial violence and hatred are not the responsibility of students of color to solve! Without white people, racism would not exist. As a white person I am outraged at the recent attacks on people of color on this campus. Every day I am confronted with story after story of students who are discriminated against on the basis of skin color.

As I read the Collegian this morning, I was struck by the fact that the only groups meeting to talk about the racial violence on this campus are groups of students of color. Wake up White students — we need to be part of the solution too! So you're sitting there, reading this, saying to yourself, "I'm not a racist. I don't participate in violence against people of color. This isn't my problem." Guess what: it is your problem! What have you done to end racism? Have you lifted your voice in protest of these atrocities? Have you lifted a finger in support of the students of color on this campus who are in constant fear of harassment and violence? Have you really done anything? Now is the time for action! Become an outspoken ally.

I strongly encourage White students on this campus to organize against racism. It is time we talk about what our role as allies is and to mobilize against the heinous events happening on campus. Come to an organizational meeting of White students and staff tonight at 9 p.m. on the 19th floor of Kennedy. We can't let the violence continue — it is time for action. No one is free when others are oppressed.

Education must replace "celebration" as Columbus Day approaches

Is it in the spirit of justice, democracy and freedom that we mark a date on our calendar to "celebrate" the enslavement of African Americans, apartheid in South America, the Armenian genocide, the killing fields of Cambodia, the famine of Somalia or the Jewish Holocaust? If your answer is NO, then it's inconsistent to continue to celebrate as a University holiday the mass destruction of just about every Native American society. We must end this tradition of celebrating violence against people of color by replacing it with a day of education and reflection rather than "celebration."

Concerned students have taken the first step in petitioning Governor William Weld to set a nationwide example by replacing the University's "Columbus Day Holiday" with a "Columbus Day Commemorative Teach-In." For the upcoming Quincentennary, we have planned the "First Annual Columbus Day Commemorative Teach-In" for October 12. The program will include faculty lectures, student workshops, community panel discussions and films presenting the many different perspectives on the legacy of Columbus.

We can't change 500 years of violence against people of color but we can and must prevent it from continuing in our future. Let the University come together and mark this date not through celebration, but through real education and reflection so we can find some understanding and hopefully prevent further racial incidents on our campus. We eagerly await the Governor's endorsement making this annual event reaching the entire campus community. In the meantime, we are conducting an informal workshop inside Memorial Hall on "500 years of violence." We will stay here until we hear from Gov. Weld. Come join us. Everybody's support is necessary in order to achieve this historic goal.

No celebration, real education!

domestic violence. A loudspeaker was set up in a window of the building so the demonstrators could speak to the crowd of about 75 people on the lawn in front of the building.

As the demonstrators peered under the banners on the building and around a poster of Malcolm X hanging on the window, they spoke to the people telling their own stories of oppression, the stories of others and their perceptions of Columbus Day and the treatment of women of color. The demonstrators then opened the discussion to the people and a megaphone was brought forth for the people in the crowd to speak.

Patricia Guedes, a Latina woman present at the rally yesterday, said, "Columbus Day should not be a holiday." She also said the day should be remembered as "a day of mourning and awareness-raising".

Mike Kaplan, a resident assistant in Moore, said at the rally he hears how men talk about and refer to women and he is tired of it. Kaplan said, "I suggest the guys out there think about who you are. You are just oppressing someone because of their physical and biological features." He also said, "Give women respect, because they deserve it."

"People need to educate themselves on oppressiveness and diverse social issues," Keith said.

Keith said students can help stop racism by checking their own words and actions and by watching the behaviors of others.

In a prepared statement, Chancellor Richard O'Brien said he deplored the events in Washington.

"The recent violence and harassment in Washington Tower is intolerable," O'Brien said. "This campus is implacably opposed to such acts, and will do everything possible to punish the guilty and to protect against future occurrences."

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Thomas B. Robinson is "having a whole series of meetings with minority groups," O'Brien said.

Many students and staff say they cannot remember a racial incident of this level occurring on campus.

"Nothing [has happened] of this magnitude. The community will heal," Hiza said. "A lot of people do not agree with this racial incident, they are feeling very angry. Lots of good people are on the look out and the residents will not let this happen again."

nity," said Matt Malone, a junior political science major and resident of the corridor. "It allows us, as GLB students, a unique forum for discussion of the issues pertinent to our lives.

This floor is also unique as it is the second of its type in the country, with the University of California at Santa Cruz the only other university to have such a floor.

"I hope other universities take our lead. I consider the corridor to be an excellent addition to the supposed 'diverse atmosphere' on campus," said Ellen Paleologopoulos, a sophmore STPEC major and resident of the Social Diversity Floor in Brett.

Residents of Social Diversity Floor have expressed concern that GLB students will not continue to request the SDF as an alternative floor to the Two in Twenty.

"The Social Diversity Floor was formerly a haven for GLB students," said Keith Kirkness, a senior psychology major. "GLB students have had a great influence in creating a living environment for students who question mainstream American values," Kirness said.

Although arguments have been raised against the idea of seperate floors for minority groups, LBGA member Louise Godchaux said she believes they are necessary.

"Division between different peoples is a condition that already exists — we didn't create it," Godchaux said. "We would all like to feel integrated and safe within society. But until we acheive that we have to take one step at a time."

Heritage and Somerset savings banks have private insurance that will cover excess deposits.

The FDIC does not make public its version of Heller's analysis, but officials said about 80 banks nationwide appear to be in danger, and 1,044 of the nation's 12,115 banks are "problems."

Some analysts say no one has noticed the impending crisis because President Bush and Democratic nominee Bill Clinton haven't discussed the banking crisis. In that sense, they say, the situation harks back to 1988, when the S&L crisis was largely ignored in the presidential campaign.

"To say that we've got to shrink the banking industry very carefully, because there is not enough good business to go around, is not an attractive thing to say when you're running for office," said Martin Mayer, an author specializing in banking.

Last year, Congress passed a law that requires regulators to close or sell institutions that are "critically undercapitalized," or too far gone to recover from their losses. Once a bank reaches that mark, regulators usually are required to shut it down within 90 days.

Also, the $100,000 insurance limit will be followed much more stringently than in the past.

The new capitalization regulations take effect Dec. 19. Any bank on the verge of extinction faces almost immediate seizure after that date, the Globe said.

New York lags in hiring Black police officers

By VIRGINIA BYRNE
Associated Press

NEW YORK — In spite of affirmative action programs, New York ranks last in a 50-city survey that measures how closely police forces reflect the cities' Black populations.

Los Angeles, where allegations of brutality by White officers touched off riots earlier this year, was ranked near the top, along with San Francisco, Miami, San Jose, Calif., Omaha, Neb., and Toledo, Ohio.

The survey, released Wednesday, found that the percentage of Black officers in the New York Police Department has not increased in nine years.

"The lack of progress is absolutely astonishing for Black police officers in New York City," said Sam Walker, a professor of criminal justice at the University of Nebraska, who conducted the survey.

In contrast, Chicago boosted its number of Black officers by 23.5 percent and Houston's rose by 48.5 percent since 1983. The city's population was 38.7 percent Black in the 1990 census.

The study found many big-city forces had made only small gains in making their departments more representative of their communities by hiring additional Blacks, Hispanics and women.

"New York is the worst because of the high volume of hiring they've done," Walker said. "They had an opportunity and it failed."

"I'm more of a mind to think there's a systematic problem in the method of selection," said Hubert Williams, president of the Police Foundation, a think tank on policing issues.

The department has hired at least 1,500 officers a year since 1983 to replace retiring officers, and currently is hiring about 3,000 officers a year.

Acting Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly blamed the department's failure to reflect the city's racial makeup on its recruiting efforts in minority communities.

"For the last five years the male Black numbers have stagnated and this is at a time when we've had two Black police commissioners for eight years," Kelly said.

He also acknowledged the department has a longstanding image problem in the city's Black neighborhoods. "Black opinion leaders have been down on the police for a long time, some with justification," he said.

Detective Robert Rivers, head of the Guardians Association, a group of Black officers, said "we see the police as rude to us as a people, including the black police officers. We don't see [joining the force] as something positive."

The police force in Los Angeles is 14.1 percent Black, reflecting the city's 14 percent Black population, the survey found. Since 1983, the percentage of Black officers has risen 81.8 percent.

New York City fared somewhat better in the hiring of Hispanic officers, but still lagged behind Philadelphia, Detroit and Buffalo, N.Y. It had 53.6 percent more Hispanics on the force in 1992 than in 1983 and is up to 13.6 percent Hispanic, the survey indicated.

Abortion drug seen effective for dual usage

By DANIEL Q. HANEY
Associated Press

BOSTON — A controversial French-made abortion drug is also a highly effective morning-after pill, preventing all pregnancies in women who have unprotected sex, a study found.

The drug, RU486, has not been approved for use in the United States.

A study conducted in Scotland and published in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine concluded that making the drug available for use after intercourse could reduce the need for abortions.

However, one anti-abortion group said it would fight this use of the drug, arguing that a morning-after pill is just another form of abortion.

The drug is available only in France, where it was introduced in 1988, and in Britain, Sweden and China.

The drug acts on the hormonal system to trigger abortions early in pregnancy. It causes the embryo or fetus to become separated from the uterine wall and be expelled.

When used as a morning-after pill, RU486 is believed to prevent implantation of the fertilized egg in the wall of the uterus.

In the study, doctors from the University of Edinburgh compared RU486 to high doses of the birth-control pill, now the standard morning-after approach, but one that frequently causes nausea and doesn't always work.

"People are trying to find a highly effective form of post-coital contraceptive that is easy to use and free from side effects," said Dr. Anna Glasier, who directed the study. "It would seem that RU486 meets those requirements."

The research was conducted on 800 women who sought emergency contraception within three days of having unprotected intercourse.

Half the women were given RU486 and half got birth control pills. None of the women taking RU486 got pregnant, compared with four pregnancies among those receiving birth control pills. RU486 was also less likely to cause nausea.

The main drawback of RU486 was that it delayed the start of menstrual periods by a few days in about 40 percent of women, researchers said. This caused anxiety in those worried about whether the treatment had actually worked.

Glasier said the World Health Organization will soon start a study to see if a lower dose of RU486 than the one they tried will be as effective in preventing pregnancy.

Dr. David A. Grimes of the University of Southern California said the drug is a contraceptive, not an abortive agent, because pregnancy does not begin until an embryo is implanted in the uterus.

Mass. high on trash list

Report raps state's incineration record

BOSTON (AP) — Massachusetts relies more heavily on trash incineration than other states, according to a group that is pushing for passage of a packaging and recycling initiative.

The Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group report released today ranks states in eight different categories measuring their use of incineration as a method of solid waste disposal, and the environmental and economic impact of incineration in each state.

MassPIRG favors passage of a ballot question that would require packagers to meet certain standards designed to reduce the amount of materials used in packaging their products.

According to the MassPIRG study, Massachusetts burns 48 percent of its solid waste, a rate that is higher than average nationwide. The study also says that Massachusetts produces 816,000 tons of ash, more than any other state.

MassPIRG also says that Massachusetts taxpayers spend $179.5 million a year to burn their trash, more than any other state for which similar data is available.

"Incineration is nothing more than an expensive way to turn a ton of harmless garbage into 500 pounds of toxic ash, which then must be landfilled," said Amy Perry, solid waste program director for MassPIRG. Perry said the report supports her contention that the recycling initiative should pass to reduce trash.

The top five states that rely most heavily on incineration include Massachusetts, Connecticut, Florida, Maine and New Hampshire, according to the MassPIRG study.

"Obviously we would like to see more recycling and more reuse and less landfilling and incineration," said Te Leone of DEP.

"But in the hierarchy of disposable options, we still feel that incineration still poses less of an environmental threat than does landfilling."

Landfills can pose a threat to water supplies in the state.

Gov. William F. Weld supports the recycling ballot initiative, which would appear on the ballot as Question 3.

A group that is opposed to the recycling ballot measure contends that Question 3 will not reduce trash.

"We stand by our position that Question 3 will leave 90 percent of this state's waste completely untouched," said Steve Allen of the No on 3 Committee, an industry-supported group.

"Question 3 is about repackaging," Allen said. "This issue that they're raising today has nothing to do with Question 3.

government treasurer, Aronson said. Debbie Marino beat Lou Dias by 20 votes, he said.

Aronson said the election in Field residence hall was voided because of a procedural error. A candidate for office in Field was operating the ballot box, which breaks SGA election rules, Aronson said.

According to Aronson, out of the 100 available senate seats, 60 were filled. He said the SGA does expect more seats to be filled because the Third World Caucus has to appoint 13 percent of the available seats in the senate.

He said the SGA is in the process of calling commuter students who only received one vote. "The number of commuter senators should increase when the SGA hears whether these students accept the seat," said Aronson.

"The SGA has an adequately filled senate right now, but I would love to have every seat in the senate filled," said senior Mike Poster, vice president of Commuter Area Government.

Poster said if a student is interested in joining the senate later on in the year, they should talk to either their house council president if they live in the residence halls, or the Commuter Area Government president if they commute.

Matt Pavesi, chair of Public Policy Committee, said his goal was to get students registered to vote and to set up the new state wide voter data base computer system. "This system will do things such as, making the process of applying for an absentee ballot easier for students," he said.

■ EWC

"White women try to counsel women of color who have cultural differences that White women don't understand," wrote one respondent. Several women of color wrote that the EWC did not have the services that they needed and that they felt uncomfortable there.

Sage Freechild, coordinator of the EWC's Counselor/Advocate Program acknowledged that there is a "service gap" in services to women of color.

One woman of color noted that although she found the EWC to be helpful, she would "like to see groups specifically for women of color."

About 65 percent of women of color wrote that they had never heard of the EWC and were unfamiliar with its services. Outreach to White women seemed to be more effective since 70 percent of White women reported that they knew the EWC existed if they needed it.

"The need in the community is great but the EWC does not have multilingual counselors," said Seng Ty, a volunteer at the Cambodian Assistance Association of Western Massachusetts.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Refuse to suffer in an unhappy work environment. Speak up for changes or find a way to move on. An important letter finally arrives. A friend or relative's encouragement sends your spirits soaring.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Showcase your special talents. Otherwise, nobody will ever get to know what you can do. You find a subtle way to communicate your wishes to someone in authority.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Take any delays in stride and redouble your efforts. Accusing others of being uncooperative will only create tension. Keep your promises to small fry.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Someone you speak with on the phone could be very astute. Do not question others' motives but take seriously any warnings that come your way. Take an afternoon walk.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Your association with a special group is a potential gold mine. Hold meetings, make phone calls and write timely letters. Positive thinking is a must for career or romantic success.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): A professional or domestic mystery needs to be solved. Two heads are better than one; work in concert with your mate or partner. Curb personal spending until you have a tidy sum in the bank.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Happily, you and your partner work well together. Build a bright future for those you love. Your dedication is unquestioned, even by those who would prefer other methods.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A major breakthrough is likely where a partnership, legal matter or long-distance union is concerned. Let the words flow freely if you are moved. Turn to a creative writing project tonight.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Agreements and alliances rapidly fall into place today. Both your professional and social contacts lend you spellbinding. Your sixth sense helps you discover if someone has a hidden agenda.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Do not allow yourself to be haunted by a financial mistake. The past is over. If you postpone making a major decision until next week, you will be happier with your choice.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A spontaneous approach provides the right answer in an emergency. You feel more in control of your life and are more productive. Do not chase after an indifferent partner.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): The money signs you have been looking for appear today. Your social life improves at the same time your career takes off.

If the Seattle Mariners are Atlanta Braves wannabes, then former UMass lefty ace will don the god-awful new Mariners' logo quite soon. The Braves rotation boasts three fine southpaws: Tom Glavine, Steve Avery, and Charlie Liebrandt. The trio combined for a record of 46-26. And, as we all know, the Braves are on their way to a second straight N.L. pennant.

So, if it can be said that lefties bring success, enter Villone. The Mariners suffered through a 64-98 season, but their talented lefty duo of Randy Johnson and Dave Fleming accounted for 45% of their victories. It might be asking a bit too much of Villone to go 17-2 for an identical 46-26 record, but it appears that Seattle weans southpaws much like the Braves, and with a lineup that contains Griffey Jr., A.L. batting champ Edgar Martinez, and slugging Jay Buhner, if you add Villone, have you got a contender?

Maybe I'm just kidding myself. Good luck, Ronnie, but damn, those new hats are ugly!

Bruins brace for new season

By BOB GLOSTER
Associated Press

Though the season is just beginning, the Boston Bruins are treating their first few games as crucial.

The Bruins, who lost to Stanley Cup champion Pittsburgh in thew third rounds of the playoffs last season, play three games in the next five days- all at home. Then they hit the road until the end of October.

"It's important for us to start on the right foot," said captain Ray Bourque. "To come out of this month over .500 would be a big plus, because most of our games our on the road."

The Bruins open their season by hosting Hartford on Thursday, followed by the New York Islanders on Saturday and the expansion Ottawa Senators on Monday. Then they have five straight road games before returning home on Oct. 29 against Los Angeles.

The early part of the schedule will present a challenge for young players such as forwards Joe Juneau, Ted Donato, and Steve Heinze, all of whom joined the Bruins late last season after the Winter Olympics.

Veterans such as Bourque and fellow defensemen Glen Wesley say the 1992-93 Bruins have the potential to be the best team on which they've played.

I think it's the most talented team here for a long time. On offense, we have some young guys with great hands who can create some scoring opportunities," Bourque said.

"There are a lot of new faces, guys that came in last year at the end. There's a lot of talent, a lot of speed on this squad."

because, according to his coach Stan Perkowski, he transferred high schools and was subject to a "bureaucratic sanction."

"He hasn't played much high school ball, but he has all the tools," Perkowski said. "He is extremely agile, is a great finisher and possesses all the skills of a 6-foot-1 player.

"He just needs to get on a real court and play. He needs to gain some real game experience. He'll be an NBA lottery pick by the time he's a senior."

Camby, who visited campus in September, is also being recruited by Connecticut, Providence, Boston College, Hawaii and James Madison.

The Minutemen are also in on a couple of blue-chippers from Philadelphia. Rasheed Wallace, a 6-foot-11 defensive terror, is considered by Francis, to be one of the top two seniors in the nation.

"He's a pro. Definitely the best defensive player in the class," Francis said. "He has one of the quickest first steps for a player that size I've seen."

Wallace, who averaged 17.3 points, 17.5 rebounds and 8.7 blocked shots, lists UMass his top 10 schools and he will whittle his list down to five next week. UMass may make the cut, but Francis does not expect the Minutemen to land Wallace.

Also in the hunt are Temple, Georgetown, Ohio State, Kentucky, North Carolina, Kansas and Virginia.

Also a Philadelphia native is Jason Lawson, who Francis ranks as "a top 30 player." Lawson, a 6-foot-10 forward/center, averaged 17.0 points, 15.0 rebounds and eight blocks last season.

Lawson will visit campus in October, but Francis predicts he will attend Georgia Tech in the fall.

UMass is also in the running for 6-foot-9 power forward Austin Croshere of Santa Monica Crossroads High School. Croshere, a banger who also possesses a nice touch, according to Francis, is also being recruited by Providence, Notre Dame, BC and Oregon.

Hoop recruiting falls into place

Padilla, Traveiso, Jackson lead Bay State brigade

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts basketball team has already received a verbal commitment from guard Edgar Padilla, a Springfield native, and are closing in on another Bay State guard, Boston's Carmelo Traveiso.

Traveiso, a 6-foot-2 shooting guard, attends Thayer Academy (Braintree, Mass.) where he averaged 24.4 points, four assists and five steals last season. Traveiso visited campus in late September and will likely sign a letter of intent to Massachusetts, during the early signing period (Nov. 11-18).

"I like UMass," Traveiso said. "I will probably sign with UMass, right now it is my first choice."

Traveiso is considered a pure shooter, who possesses three point range.

"He plays an up-tempo style and he's good in the open court," said Thayer coach Rob Dixon. "He can really shoot, he has three point range. He is also a good defensive player."

Clark Francis, editor of Hoop Scoop magazine, calls Traveiso as "one of the top 150 preps in the country."

"He's a good athlete and he is one hell of a shooter," Francis said. "He is a little frail but he'll be a good role player for UMass. He's an Atlantic 10 player but UMass is better than A-10."

Traveiso is also being recruited by Penn State, Richmond and Cleveland State. If he signs he will join his friend Padilla in the UMass backcourt.

Padilla, a 6-foot-2 point guard, has already verbally committed to UMass. Padilla, who averaged 22.7 points, 8.0 assists and 8.5 assi[illegible]r Springfield Central High School, is considered "a top 50 prospect" by Francis.

"Padilla can move the ball well and should prove to be a good point guard," Francis said. "He is a good commitment for UMass."

Another Massachusetts player who may land in Amherst is former East Boston High School forward Jamal Jackson.

Jackson's first choice, according to Francis, is Boston College, but the forward may not have the grades to get in. Neither Jackson nor his former coach Mike Rubin could be reached for comment.

Francis sees Jackson as a considerable talent who ranks among the "top 10 to 15 preps in the country."

"He reminds me of [UMass freshman] Donta [Bright]," Francis said. "He is super-quick and he possesses a tremendous move to the basket. He may have better range than Bright. He has All-A-10 potential. He has All-Big East potential.

"If he comes and teams with Donta, then you haven't seen anything from UMass yet. The potential for UMass in two years is scary. He's phenomenal. If they pull him, it will be incredible."

The UMass coaching staff can not comment on any recruit due to NCAA rules. However, Francis feels Jackson is a lock for the Minutemen.

"If he gets his grades up, he's in," Fancis said. "As far as I know it's a done deal."

Another New Englander, who UMass is recruiting, is Marcus Camby, from Hartford Public High School. Camby, a 6-foot-11 running center, did not play last season

Women beat Yale for 11th win

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts got some needed practice at beating teams from Connecticut yesterday, as the Minutewomen defeated Yale, 1-0.

Massachusetts (11-0) will play regional powers Hartford and the University of Connecticut in the next two weeks, so a tune up from a team from the Constitution State was helpful, at least psychologically.

The game-winning goal came in the 19th minute, off the foot of senior forward Kim Eynard.

Massachusetts' Nicole Roberts squared the ball from the top of the goal box to Eynard on the left flank. Eynard drove past a defender and from 20 yards out lofted a shot over the head of Bulldog goal keeper Tina Phil.

"It was a wonderful goal, an unbelievable shot," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "It was a lefty shot and she placed it perfectly. It may have been her best goal since she's been here."

The tally was Eynard's eighth overall and her sixth game winner of the season.

"She is playing great," Rudy said. "She is so much stronger this year. She's not getting knocked around and she is finishing the play well."

Massachusetts got another solid effort in the net, this time from Briana Scurry. Scurry (6-0), faced three shots en route to recording her fourth shutout of the season. Her goals against average now stands at a mere 0.50.

Also helping Scurry was a Minutwomen defense which stymied the Yale attack.

"Bri played well but our defense didn't allow Yale to get any difficult shots on," Rudy said.

Leading Bulldog scorer Jen Teti (7 goals) was shadowed by UMass sophomore Heidi Kocher, and was effectively contained.

"Heidi played a great game," Rudy said. "She just shut Teti down by playing her tough one-on-one."

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

UMass women's soccer team battled Yale last night. The Minutemen are currently the eighth ranked team in the nation.

Massachusetts, despite winning three games last week, dropped from No. 5 to No. 8 nationally and from second to third regionally. Hartford is ranked fifth in the country and Connecticut is third. Hartford (10-1), who have lost only to Rutgers, a team UMass beat earlier this year, jumped ahead of UMass in both polls this week. UMass hosts the Hawks on Saturday.

"The polls are pretty ridiculous," Rudy said. "I do not know what the pollsters are thinking but dropping behind Hartford will help in our motivation for Saturday."

Scott's shots

The Red Sox's apology letter to their fans didn't quite cut it, but it should serve as a good rough draft for the boys in Foxboro.

Dear Fans of New England: Back in September we were prepared to do "Whatever it Takes" to field a winning team — unfortunately we didn't realize that meant putting bionic parts in Hugh Millen in order to get him to scramble. We are sorry, but not as sorry as those guys from Fenway. Thank you, Bud Man.

• Don Zimmer threw out the first pitch before last Sunday's game, as a farewell to Boston, but now the thought is to give him Matt Young's slot in the rotation.

Dave
SCOTT

• The latest Dave Scott/CNBSXYZ poll shows UMass assistant hoops coach Bill Bayno inching past John Calipari in the early race for Cravat King. Bayno has been tying some sweet silks around his neck as of late, but with Midnight Madness still three weeks away, Bayno might be peaking too soon.

Insiders report that Hampshire Gazette sports guru Milt Cole could be a surprise entrant into this year's race for Best Tie Guy in the Valley.

• For Them to lose Garin Veris is one thing, but seeing Keith Jackson catch a touchdown pass from Dan Marino truly shows They are not committed to winning.

• We've received complaints that this space caters to a very limited audience. The mere fact that this space caters to any audience is cause for celebration.

• It's fair to say that the next UMass Athletic Director will have a much easier transition due in large part to the dedication of Interim AD Glenn Wong. Many times we fail to appreciate what we have, when we have it; that shouldn't be the case with Wong.

• (Watch as I deftly weave entertainment into the sports page.) The newest Celtic, Xavier McDaniel, has a cameo role in "Singles," the '90s version of "St. Elmo's Fire." The Celtics may have filled a need in the frontcourt, but their quest for an actor who can slam fell well short.

• Give me Kirby Puckett over any of the upcoming free agents.

• Professional football is actually alive and well in Boston. It happens to be in the form of the BC Eagles, but beggars can't be choosers.

• Wade Boggs doesn't sound like a man who will be calling Fenway home next year and at this point in his career that might be okay. But shame on you to forget all he gave to Red Sox fans. He will be one of those guys you tell your kids and grandkids about (omitting the Margo part of course).

• The Move to Mullins brings with it many bonuses for the entire community but lost in the shuffle will be the ever popular "Rage in the Cage" battle cry.

Substitutes will be hard to come by. "Slap Your Shins in Mull-ins" won't cut it. "There'll be No Dull-ins When We Rock Mull-ins" seems doomed. Perhaps we can consult with the genius in Foxboro who devised "Together We Win" and "Whatever It Takes."

• Okay, Coach Jim Rudy's girls go from being ranked ninth to 10th to fifth and this week end up eighth. They are undefeated. The coaches voting in this poll are the same guys who kept working for Perot when he dropped out of the race in the summer.

Weak Bucs fans, unknown stars, and the Sox

Just a few thoughts about the 1992 baseball season, to this point and beyond:

If the Pirates don't sell out Three Rivers Stadium for all post-season contests, then I hope their playoff futility continues. Don't tell me the place is too big; when I stood in line for Red Sox playoff tickets in 1986, 1988, and 1990 (memories I might want to hold dear), there were always enough people waiting with me to fill any park in the league many times over. If Pittsburgh doesn't haven't have the fans, they shouldn't even have the team, much less the pennant.

Phillies' third baseman Dave Hollins, Padres' center fielder Darrin Jackson, and Cardinals' center fielder Ray Lankford form the foundation for my 1992 Team-of-damn-good-players-you've probably-never-heard-of.

Hollins, playing in his first full season, smacked 27 home runs, good for 4th place in the National League and added 93 runs batted in, the sixth-best total in the senior circuit. Hollins, along with first baseman John Kruk and catcher Darren Daulton form the offensive nucleus that Philadelphia manager Jim Fregosi hopes will be the key to his club improving its victory total of 70 this season.

Ted
KOTTLER

Jackson, who has played in the shadow of Tony Gwynn and Gary Sheffield, deserves his own ink. The seven-year veteran hit just .249 but also had 17 home runs and 70 RBIs and stole 14 bases in 17 attempts. But Jackson's real asset is his fielding. While there are plenty of potent batsmen who double as first-rate fielders (Barry Bonds, Ken Griffey Jr.), Gold Gloves are often awarded to moderate fielders whose offensive numbers thrust them into the limelight.

But no one is more deserving of the N.L. center field Gold Glove Award than Jackson. He led the majors in outfield assists with 18, 7 of which doubled off baserunners, also tops in the league, and made just 2 errors in 1338.1 innings (the highest mark in the N.L. was 1373.2, by the Pirates' Andy Van Slyke), good for a tie with Lankford for a league-best .996 fielding percentage.

And then there's Lankford, for whom a case could be made that he is one of the N.L.'s best all-around players. He hit .293 with 20 home runs and 86 RBIs, and he also rapped out 40 doubles and stole 42 bases, though he was caught 24 times. And his performance on par with Jackson shows his fielding talent. I think there's a team on the other side of Massachusetts that could use a guy like this. Think they've ever heard of him?

Speaking of Red Sox Nation (Shaughnessy, The Boston Globe), I don't want to be the umpteenth armchair GM to offer his cure-all for 1993, but let me just say this: I think the front office has its priorities jumbled. For the Boston brass to feel that signing a closer is their second greatest concern in the off-season is pretty thoughtless. Nick Cafardo, also of the Globe, said it best: "A closer is the last piece of the puzzle [when putting a contender together]."

So what comes first? Could it be, a starter? Yes, Lou Gorman, that's what you really need. You've already said you're going to loosen the purse strings and tackle the free agent market once more, so why not do it right this time. The best starter available is none other than Chicago Cubs' Cy Young front-runner Greg Maddux.

A closer will only have a chance to work if his starters give him save opportunities, and Maddux rivals Roger Clemens in effectiveness in this department. Face it, guys: Frank Viola might win 13 again, but Danny Darwin and John Dopson are not going to get it done. You sign Maddux and Bonds or Joe Carter, and you're the pick of the A.L. East. But if you merely get Bobby Thigpen or Todd Worrell to sign on the dotted line, you won't win many more than 73 from next April to October.

Wynton Marsalis and the Lincoln Center Jazz Orchestra

FAC concert will feature the music of Duke Ellington, "the quintessential American composer"

By MARTIN F. JONES
Collegian Staff

The Lincoln Center Jazz Orchestra will be appearing tonight at 8pm in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall. The 16-piece big-band orchestra, which features world-class trumpeter Wynton Marsalis, will be performing the music of Duke Ellington on its latest stop in a national tour.

"It's appropriate to tour the country with the music of Duke Ellington," remarked Mr. Marsalis, "because he is the quintessential American composer. Ellington best illuminates what american society has represented and should represent. He wrote comprehensively for all idioms - sacred music, dance music, orchestral scores. He's what jazz is."

The Lincoln Center Jazz Orchestra will be conducted by composer and arranger David Berger. Berger, who has trancribed more than two-hundred Eliington masterworks will be conducting two different all-Ellington programs including "Mood Indigo," "Ko-Ko," "Black and Tan Fantasy," "Creole Blues," "Princess Blue," "Lady of Lavender Mist," "The Queen's Suite," "Peer Gynt Suite" and other works.

Members of the Lincoln Center Jazz orchestra include: trumpeters Wynton Marsalis, Lew Soloff, Marcus Belgrave and Umar Sharif; saxophonists Jerry Dodgion, Norris Turney, Todd Williams and Joe Temperlay; clarinetist Bill Easley; trombonists Britt Woodman, Art Baron and Wycliffe Gordon; pianist Sir Roland Hanna; bassist Reginald Veal; drummer Herlin Riley; and vocalist Milt Grayson.

Trumpeter Wynton Marsalis, who serves as artistic director, has attained world-class stature as a musician and his effect on the course of heightened jazz awareness in America is one of the most exciting musical phenomena of the decade. Mr. Marsalis began his Columbia recording career in 1982 with his self-titled debut album produced by Herbie Hancock. Since then his career has continued to grow and flourish, over a dozen albums and receiving numerous Grammys and other awards.

The Lincoln Center Jazz Orchestra tour is part of Jazz at the Lincoln Center. The program, which was inaugurated in January, 1991, grew out of the Lincoln Center's popular Classical Jazz series, which celebrates its sixth season this August.

Tickets to tonight's performance at the Fine Arts Center start at $16; with half-price tickets for Five College students.

My Secret Garden captures family's genocide

By RACHEL D. MEDANIC
Collegian Correspondent

In a painting entitled "Somehow We Survive, about the often forgotten Armenian genocide, a banner reads: "In my garden the wounds run deep." In her exhibit at Hampden Gallery, artist Jan Atamian explores her own feelings and perceptions about her lost heritage, a result of the mass killing by the Young Turks in the Armenian Massacre from 1915-1918.

Atamian entitles her exhibit My Secret Garden. In vivid color Atamian shares with the viewer thorough portraits and symbolism the repercussions of having lost some of her ancestors as the result of genocide.

"Somehow We Survive," a self-portrait, is one of Atamian's most moving pieces in the collection. The focal point is a woman in a pink dress slitted to reveal a blood red heart. The woman is standing in the entrance to a garden.

Beside the self-portrait is another with more boldly political overtones. The painting is called "My Secret Garden." Atamian classifies it as "...a self-portrait depicting my masked sadness, combined with a family tree whose roots were nurtured in genocide."

In the painting's background there is a photo of Gulf War protestors with red paint lettered across the top of the photo that reads "New World Order." The masked woman in the painting is holding a tree with the bodies and faces of ancestors in it.

Also striking about the collection is her only piece done in pencil, depicting her early years called "My Childhood In Spaghetti." A girl in braids is being blown by wind and has her feet tangled in spaghetti. All this is indicative of the confusion she felt growing up in regard to her ancestors.

The collection has many portraits of Atamian's family, one in particular of her parents sitting in a living room. In the foreground on the coffee table, Atamian has painted words on the open pages of a book that reads: "I found the remains of one thousand years, shaped in curving limbs, carved to perfection. Without hands, without sandpaper, on the moon to push."

Atamian had a quilt in mind for her ceramic on wood work entitled, "My Auntie and the Armenian Genocide." Resting on the floor, the work is about the last surviving member of the generation that survived the massacres. Atamian said her great aunt, the main subject of the mural, passed away last week. Atamian's work strongly conveys just what is involved in those who suffer the aftermath of genocide. It lends itself to being in touch with history that perhaps until now had had virtually no voice with which to express what was happening.

Fashion: Finally, cosmetic justice at the Gap

By CUTTER GARCIA
Collegian Staff

If you're 5'7 or more don't read this story, it's not meant for your eyes. If you're under that number, however, then read on baby — I've got some news that's gonna rock your world . . .

How many times have you found yourself dreading going shopping for a new pair of pants? *Too*many — right? That sinking feeling which develops in your gut. The one that gnaws away at your self pride declaring, "HA! HA! HA! Just wait until all the people laugh when they see your feet under the changing room door with all that EXTRA material lying about!" Sucks, doesn't it?

Well batten down the hatches and seal in the chickens because The GAP has just released a 28 inch Inseam on its GAP Jeans line.

That's right kids! FINALLY somebody has noticed that not everybody who buys clothes is 6'3.

Gone are the days of the cuff. And while you talls out there might consider the cuff to be a trendy fashion statement, to us it is a curse handed down through our genes. (HA!HA!HA! Get it?) A curse which has challenged and forced us to become clever.

How many times have you been looking in that mirror of the changing room and making that stupid rationalization, "Hmm — if I take these to the tailor and have him cut a bit off they'll look just fine." The problem is that by the time Gepetto is done working on them you have pants that are the right length, but the foot holes are wide enough to drive a truck through.

With this new 28 inch inseam from the wonderful people at The GAP we too can now do that thing which we have only been able to fantasize about for so long now . . . last minute shopping! That's right! For the first time ever we can go out and buy a shirt AND pants at the same time! And they'll both fit! Sometimes life is cool.

The only drawback to all of this good news is that The GAP is only releasing the 28 inch length in jeans to see how they sell. When I spoke to a saleswoman at the GAP in the Holyoke Mall (through tears of joy from being able to see my shoes) she said that if they sell well then The GAP will make the 28 a standard length in all of its pant items.

So do yourself and all your short brethren and sisthren a favor and get down to The GAP to buy some 28's. Tell all your short friends and neighbors. This is big, kids, real big.

Now if we could just get the guy at the amusement park to drop the, 'You must be this tall to ride,' line on that embarrassing sign...

Exhibit explores multiculturalism through art

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

Mr. Fox and his Sax

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

Those of you who have decided to stick around for this long weekend made a wise decision, because you have the chance to become part of history Friday. Right here, on our very own UMass campus, Senior Mark Fox will present an unprecedented exhibit-in-motion as his Senior Thesis for his B.A. in African-American studies. Created to communicate the idea of multiculturalism, this unique exhibit, "Historical Disintegration: American Individualism and the Absence of Historical-Cultural Understanding" will evoke all senses and expose the viewer first-hand to the sights, sounds, smells, and tastes of various cultures.

The exhibit will comprise of three artistic components: an ongoing jazz concert, the creation of a three-part totem pole of oil drums, and the preparation of ethnic cuisine. Combined, these three aspects are to present "a cutting edge, musical, visual, culinary vision of multiculturalism."

"The depth of the piece is not on the undergraduate level," asserts Fox. "I am the first one to attempt something like this, and pushing the idea of multiculturalism through art."

A talented musician and master of the tenor saxophone, Fox will be featured in the musical component of the exhibit playing his own compositions from the past five years. Fox will be accompanied by seven other musicians.

Ed Byrne, who played an instrumental role in arranging the pieces will play the trombone. Tony Vacca, has recently released an album on Columbia records and will play percussion. John Medeski of the Either Orchestra and the Mandala Octect will play the piano. Chris Dailey, a "local, very happening drummer who is recording an album with Marion Brown" will play the drums. Agnes Zsigmondi McCraven, a Hungarian Folk master and former UMass student will be a special guest artist and vocalist. David Arenius will be on the bass and Kevin Bryan will play trumpet.

The music played will be primarily jazz, with international pulls from African, Latino and Carribean rhythms. Fox will not only play these pieces, but has been primarily responsible for composing and arranging them.

The artistic aspect of the exhibit entails the building of a three piece totem pole of sorts. Nelson Stevens, Edgar Sabogal, and Richard Heller will individually work on three separate oil drums. Approximately half-way through the exhibit, the three artists will combine the drums into one piece and paint it collectively.

The idea behind this piece according to Fox needs to be applied to society. "This is a statement in society about where things are going. This piece will model how we as a society in America need to start functioning collectively as opposed to individually."

The third component of Fox's exhibit is perhaps the most unique yet basic of the three; food. The preparation of Carribean and Jewish cuisine will add yet a third dimension to Fox's presentation which will allow the exhibit-goer to smell and taste multiculturalism. In an attempt to include all facets of culture, experiencing this aspect of other lifestyles is an innovative concept for an art exhibit.

Eric Zelman will prepare traditional Jewish foods, while Vladimir and Victoria Morales will cook Carribean cuisine.

The multi-faceted nature of this exhibit is sure to influence the viewer's idea of multiculturalism, and will no doubt expose the viewer to various aspects of the African-American, Jewish, and Latino cultures.

"My whole point is that this country is comprised of several individuals. My message concerns accepting who we are." Fox explained. "I think that this is now a homogeneous society, but one that is hetergeneous, with groups and individuals. We have to understand our own identity and accept that others identify with who they want to identify with. The statement in this piece is self-evident, we must work together."

Do not miss the chance to experience this unique and spiritual event. The exhibit begins at 8 p.m. in the Hampden Theatre. There is no charge.

New REM disc brings the band back to basics

By SHARON MURPHY
Collegian Correspondent

Automatic for the People
R.E.M.
Warner Bros.

Last year, R.E.M., the first band of college radio, surprised everyone by succumbing to the mainstream with their album, Out of Time. The success of Time made longtime fans begin to wonder if the Athens, Georgia based band could still put out real music to please them, instead of the newly converted pop music fans. On Automatic for the People, singer-lyricist Michael Stipe, guitarist Peter Buck, bassist-keyboardist Mike Mills, and drummer Bill Berry redeem themselves by returning to their folk-like roots with the occasional, unpredictable surprises that only they could do.

The album starts off on a slow note with the first single, "Drive." "Drive" contains the influence of Pink Floyd, a strange challenge that the band pulls off with out a problem. The song comes across as a political meditation for a frustrated generation in an election year.

The slow mood continues with "Try Not to Breathe" which contains a great combination of Stipe's echoing voice and Mills' harmonies. The slowness of the opening tracks sets the mood for the entire album, but does not prepare the listener for such nonsense based songs like, "The Sidewinder Sleeps Tonite" and "Man on the Moon." The first sounds like a folkish version of their 1988 song "Stand."

Stipe relieves the listener of the serious mood by talking about black-eyed peas, Nescafe on ice, and a blooper on Dr. Seuss which makes him laugh through the lyrics. The latter starts out sounding like a cowboy song, then takes a turn to allow Stipe to do an Elvis impression (yes, Elvis.)

While "Everybody Hurts" has an eerie ring of Simon and Garfunkel with a cliched message, the cliche in "Sweetness Follows" is one that rings true inside the structure of the family. The song which tells of a person getting back in touch with his siblings when his parents die is one of the most moving songs the band has done since "Fall on Me."

The centerpiece of the album lies in the simple ballad "Nights wimming." The song which was left off of the last two albums, finally finds a home. The song sends a message: enjoy the memories that you have formed through the years while there is time to look back and enjoy them.

Automatic for the People is one of those albums that the listener enjoys so much that they never want it to end even as the last note floats through the speaker. R.E.M. has saved themselves from becoming a mainstream pop band by holding onto their roots and never giving into what anyone else thinks. As the album closes, one imagines his or herself travelling down a never-ending road only wanting to absorb what is around them and holding onto the desire to drive.

Peter Gabriel gives Us an uneventful listen

By SCOTT KESNER
Collegian Staff

Us
Peter Gabriel
Geffen

While the members of Genesis continue to recede both musically and genetically, Peter Gabriel remains a integral pop icon with a wonderful head of well-aged hair.

Gabriel's new release, Us is actually the follow-up to the Last Temptation of Christ soundtrack and not to 1986's accidental hit factory, So.

On Us, Gabriel returns to the visceral art rock gestures and third world rhythms that championed his third album and Security, his forth.

The opening track, "Come Talk to Me," broaches seven soul awakening minutes of Shamonic grace while, "Only Us" slithers middle eastern style.

Unfortunately for this album, the more funky stuff doesn't work, deeming Us seemingly dour. Its first non-brooding moment, "Steam," is an uneventful gala that only John Travolta would hustle to and "Kiss that Frog" miserably fails at recapturing the kind of adorable parody that made "Sledgehammer" and "Big Time" so much fun.

Yet, all of this can be forgotten thanks to a little tune called "Digging in the Dirt," a dead calm carefully coupling irresistable hook with panoramic bravura forming a highly stylized and most hip single.

Just as Led Zeppelin used "Kashmir" as Physical Graffiti's uplifting centerpiece, "Digging in the Dirt" does much the same for Us.

Gabriel continues to highlight his music with a multi-cultural breed of guest musicians. On "Fourteen Black Paintings" he siphons the abnormally ominous bass, but more characteristic keyboards of (does anybody remember "Stairway"?) ex-Zep non-Satan worshipping John Paul Jones.

The album's best lyrical bliss, "Blood of Eden," wouldn't be so highly effective without the mellifluous blend of Sinead O'Connor's voice with Gabriel's and Shankar's subtle violin shadings.

Gabriel's regulars, Tony Levin (bass) Manu Katche (drums) and David Rhodes (guitar) remain consummate craftsmen, embellishing the album's finer tracks and rendering even the most dreadful material, (namely "Steam") saveable.

Us may be somewhat of a disappointment to Gabriel fans, but compared with the drivel that makes up so much of today's radio, it's another saving grace from a real musical martyr.

Beyond Dances with Wolves

Inside the role of Native Americans in US cinema

By DANIEL A. BROWN
Special to the Collegian

This is the first of a three-part story discussing how Native American people have been portrayed in the contemporary American cinema.

With the 500th anniversary of Columbus upon us, there has been much discussion about Native Americans and the impact 1492 has had upon them. Not surprisingly, changing views of the American Indian experience have been reflected through the years by that great mass communicator, the movies.

And while "Dances With Wolves" brought Native Americans into the cinematic spotlight, there have numerous films before it that have attempted to go beyond the usual stereotypes portraying them as bloodthirsty, scalping, yelping savages. Some have been successful, others were well-intentioned failures. A few were real howlers.

There is a major difference between movies with Native Americans and movies about them. The former includes all those John Wayne Westerns with Indians as the faceless foe. These are not included here. Instead, this review will focus on those films which attempted to tell the history of North America from the Native perspective or dramatize current issues facing indigenous people today.

There also exists many excellent low-budget films and documentaries that are too numerous to mention. I hope the reader will be lucky enough to seek them out. What appears below are critiques of some of the best-known movies dealing with Native Americans that have appeared in the last three decades.

Cheyenne Autumn (1964) — John Ford, director. Richard Widmark, Karl Malden, Ricardo Montalban, Sal Mineo. Unrated. From the best seller by Mari Sandoz.Summary: In 1878, a small band of Cheyenne led by chiefs Dull Knife and Little Wolf flee an Oklahoma reservation to return to their ancestral homeland. Struggling against overwhelming odds, their epic journey ends in the bloody snows of northern Nebraska, surrounded by U.S. calvary.

Plus: Based on a true account, this is Hollywood's first conscious attempt to portray Indians as the victims, not the aggressors. The basic storyline stays close to historical fact. Some scenes, like the winter escape from Fort Robinson, still retain their power over the years.

Minus: The "Indians" are mostly Italian actors who speak in wooden cliches and bang on Polynesian log drums. The Cheyenne are saddled with a ludicrous subplot which reduces them to soap opera dialogue. Oklahoma looks suspiciously like Arizona and the Cheyenne wear Apache headbands. The conclusion of the film suggests a fair resolution between them and the government; in fact, there was none.

Verdict: Maybe a breakthrough for its era, but embarassing to watch today. Read the book.

Bloodline
Pearl Street Nightclub
October 2, 1992

CG: When 15 year old Smokin' Joe Bonamassa began to play his guitar with his group Bloodline I was impressed. This kid was blasting through licks with a lightning speed and intensity that should not have been coming from one so young.

LC: Smokin' Joe is definitely a master musician, and it was to enjoy a guitar solo at rock n' roll show. And of course anyone that plays the "Star Spangled Banner" has to be an OK kid, even though it seemed a cheap ploy on his part to get a standing ovation.

CG: As the bluesy, hard-rocking tunes progressed, Smokin' Joe elevated what could have been a bargain-basement performance to a lofty status. Make no bones about it — Bloodline is a cleverly crafted star vehicle for Bonamassa.

The band includes bassist and lead singer Berry Oakley Jr.,19 (son of Berry Oakley), guitarist Waylon

Krieger,18 (son of Robby Krieger) and drummer Erin Davis, 20 (son of Miles Davis).

LC: Don't forget the aged keyboardist, Lou Segreti, 30 years old. Though he seemed to stand apart like a mentor, nodding approvingly now and again to Bonamassa, he mastered the keys.

CG:Bloodline had a freewheeling Little Feat essence about them going off on extended jams between lyrics.

LC: No, they all looked like Stevie Ray Vaughn clones. Oakley's voice was definitely a trip into the Twilight Zone. I was looking everywhere to see if a tape was rolling in a bizarre, evil lip sync plot.

CG: They played well but I didn't understand why they were touring if they only had two originals. Bonamassa said they were playing all original material, but at the end of their sets they liked to fool around and play some covers. Apparently they were geared towards having 12 minute gigs because they only had two original songs. But to be fair, Bonamassa did wail. His final encore of the "Star Spangled Banner" was incredibly cool. (Lisa was drunk; that's why she remembers it differently).

LC:Bloodline is going somewhere. I think that with time these guys will be able to shake the 'novelty' image and create a cohesive sound of their own. And I was NOT drunk — I was tired.

CG: Yeah, I'm going to be tired a lot this weekend too.

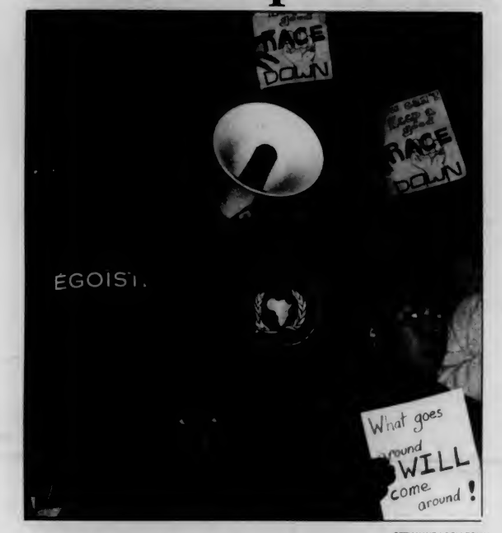
UMass explodes with racial tensions



SETH KAYE / COLLEGIAN
Ailens Barosy (left), the 17th floor Washington RA who was the victim of several racist attacks recently, speaks at the rally to address racial tensions at Washington Tower last night.

By MARTIN F. JONES

Last night, between 50-70 students stormed the Washington Tower, in the Southwest Residential Area, occupying the building for nearly two hours.

The occupation took place following a meeting at Morrill with campus administrators to discuss their handling of last week's racial attack, in Washington, on a Black Resident Assistant.

Many students present at the meeting walked out in disgust at the administration's explanation on the Universities policies towards the handling of the incident.

About 60 to 70 students marched back to Washington to confront the residents involved with the incident.

At about 10:45 p.m., the students arrived at Washington and walked past the security desk to the eighth floor in search of the resident who had served as the host of the alleged assailant, who was visiting from off campus.

The students immediately occupied the eighth floor, demanding that the resident responsible for the actions of the alleged perpetrators be expelled from housing for the remainder of the school year.

During the occupation, the entire Building was sealed off and residents were who were outside were unable to enter the building. A large number of police were inside and residents were instructed to remain in their rooms.

University officials were present in the building at the time of the occupation and negotiated with the students towards a peaceful resolution.

At 12:35 the students exited the building with a memorandum by housing director Joseph Zannini and assistant director Anne Miller agreeing to expel the residents involved from campus housing for the remainder of the school year.

Arnold Lizana, Vice-president of the UMass Black Student Union helped to negotiate the crisis towards a peaceful solution while meeting inside with the

Last night, about three hundred students of color assembled in front of the Washington tower in Southwest to hold a peaceful demonstration in support of a Resident Assistant who was an alleged victim of an assault last month.

Following the rally, students marched to Morrill for a meeting with the Vice Chancellor and other members of the Administration.

"Power to the people!", shouted Arlens Barosy, the Resident Assistant who was allegedly assaulted, from the Washington pyramids.

Barosy greeted everyone and described, in detail, the account of the incident, including the alleged racial slurs and the occurrences during the days that followed.

He expressed his dissatisfaction

UM officials meet with AASA, address concerns of racism

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Staff

University officials met with student representatives of the Asian American Student Association (ASAA) to address the concerns of Asian and Asian American students in light of recent racial incidents that have occured on campus.

The director of the Office of the Third World Affairs, Nelson Acosta, was also present at this important meeting. Paul Gee (AASA president) opened up the meeting by stressing the fact that they came into this meeting with an education agenda.

"We did not come with a list of demands, we went to create a better working relationship with the administration," said Gee.

Newly appointed Vice-Chancellor Tom Robinson believes that it is of great importance that he made contact with the students.

"We are meeting to address a mutual concern that affects us all. I am distressed by the incidents that have transpired and we need to work together to make this place a more enjoyable experience for students," said Robinson.

Paul Gee distributed a list of recommendations that focused on measures that would impact and stimulate awareness on the campus community. The list included changes in policy and public safety and trainings consisting of both RA's and The Dept. of Public Safety, as well as cultural sensitivity workshops.

Paul Gee also stated that there was a need to promote more programming such as radio announcements by WMUA, and billboard advertisements on UMass transit lines that would display the 'Civil Rights Law' to make the issue of racial harassment more visible to the community at large.

Other members expressed concerns about the issue of racial harassment and the lack of support by the University in responding to this issue.

Kara Inouye, vice-chairperson says that the University needs to be more in tune with the needs of the students by providing access to support programs for students who may have experienced some form of racial harrassment.

"We are meeting to address a mutual concern that affects us all."
Vice-Chancellor Tom Robinson

"We need to show students what's out there for support and state the law as it stands," said Inouye.

The meeting was conducted in a very constructive and positive manner. All members present agreed that pinpointing specific areas of concerns would make planning and implementation of resolutions more feasible and effective.

Paul Gee also believes that counseling for victims of racial harrassment is essential to healing and overcoming the feelings of helplessness

"We need to see organizations on campus make an effort such as counseling and student counseling services available," said Gee.

Director of the Office of Human Relations, Grant M. Ingle believes that proposed policies regarding racial harrassment are in the process of being refined and that stiffer penalities are to ensue. The process will be more expedient and will need support from all sectors of the campus community.

The proposed changes will be brought up before the legal and faculty senate within the year for final approval and adoption.

The meeting ended with a unanimous consensus to continue the dialogue with students and to work for real change at UMass.

Memorial Hall occupation continues on

By DAVID LAFONTANA
Collegian Correspondent

The occupation of Memorial Hall continued yesterday with a stalemate between the University and the protesting students.

The Students for Education have remained true to their word that they will not leave until their demands have been met by the University.

The University has in turn stated that unless the students leave, no demands will be met or even discussed.

"We've made our position clear. If you leave, we'll talk," said Dan Chen, a University spokesperson. The protestors see it differently, however.

"The Chancellor has written to us that he supports us. If those are his principles, than he should support us while we're in the building," said group member Quynh Dang.

During a teach-in today, the students reported that University officials said they weren't sure of the legality of a scholarship for women of color.

"The University said it was illegal to earmark scholarships for special interests,or along race or gender lines.

"The problem we have with that is that UMass already does that by having something like a football scholarship, which is an all-male team, and is a special interest," said group member Henry Theriault.

While Chen called the teach-ins today "duds", the protestors were more than happy to comply.

"The reason that most people didn't show up is because of the way the curriculum is set up at this university. It's racist."

The university has to ask 'What are we teaching that encourages the celebrating of Columbus Day?'. If this teach-in was a dud, so is their curriculum." said group member Alex Nguyen.

USDA plans research to cut cost of ethanol

By JENNNIFER DIXON
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Agricultural Department plans to spend $100 million over five years on research to cut the cost of producing ethanol by at least 25 percent.

Agriculture Secretary Edward Madigan said nearly $10 million would be spent this fiscal year, which began Oct. 1. USDA will seek the balance over the next four years from Congress.

"If agriculturally based fuels such as ethanol can be made cheaply enough, a vast market awaits," Madigan said in remarks prepared for delivery Thursday. "If we can cut production costs it will mean more secure energy supply, cleaner air, expanded markets for corn and a real economic boost for rural America."

Last week, President Bush eased fuel volatility regulations for corn-based ethanol. This move will boost ethanol's role in reformulated gasolines used to meet clean-air standards in smoggy urban areas.

A spokesman for the competing methanol industry criticized the administrations latest effort on behalf of ethanol as a "continuation of the election-year pandering to the activist farmers" and Archer Daniels Midland Co., an agribusiness giant which dominates the ethanol market.

Bill Orr, chairman of the National Alternative Fuels Association, said natural gas and coal, the sources of methanol, have been "sold down the river by those pandering to the farm lobby."

Orr said that gasoline blended with methanol is cleaner burning that ethanol-blended gas and that methanol costs less to produce than ethanol.

Madigan, meanwhile, said another way to expand the use of ethanol is to reduce production costs by improving manufacturing technology and by developing new products from corn or other raw materials.

The five-year research proposal will try to speed production through more efficient fermentation and recovery, as well as by raising the yield of ethanol, Madigan said.

You can't criticize the system if you don't participate in the system.

Sports careers available to all

"Sports Summit" will allow students to network

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

If you think you have to be a great athlete to have a future in the sports world, Jay Abraham, President of Sports Careers Inc., has a lesson for you.

Namely, careers in the sporting industry are not limited to the athletes, and no one can help you break into the business better than Sports Careers.

"We open people's eyes to the tremendous opportunities in sports," said Jeff Wasson, a spokesperson for the group. "It is especially good for young people because they are not sure of all the opportunities out there."

Wasson cites opportunities ranging from working for ESPN to being employed by a professional team's front office to organizing a one-time golf tournament.

"There are thousands of opportunities waiting for those who want them," Wasson said.

The number of people looking for those opportunities are growing by the day, says Wasson.

"There are people whose passion is sports," he said. "They eat, sleep, breathe and drink it. They'll do anything to get a job in it."

According to Wasson, this is where Sports Careers fits in. The company runs "Sports Summits," which are conventions where professionals from the industry lecture and counsel people looking to break into the business.

"We bring in executives from over 50 professional companies and the attendee has the opportunity to meet them and hear them speak about the business," Wasson said.

Sports Careers will be holding a "Summit" in Boston on Friday October 16th at the Boston Marriott Copley

Faculty debates Columbus Day importance

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

Society must re-examine the Columbus Day holiday, according to many University faculty.

"From my point of view the day has been silly. I don't see it as a truly important day. It is a good time to think about [Columbus discovering America], but any day is as good as any other," said African American studies professor Robert Paul Wolff.

South African history professor John Higginson also believes it should be a day of teaching about the groups that became oppressed by the discovery of Columbus.

"It should be a day of reflection rather than celebration," said Higginson.

According to Higginson, because the world's economy is shifting more towards the countries in the east, Americans must take a critical look at their society.

Yet Paul Mullins, a teaching assistant for anthropology 290, World of 1492, believes Columbus's contributions should still be remembered. For example, Columbus brought with him the idea of colleges Mullins said.

"I think our debates should not be reduced to debating whether Columbus is good or bad," Mullins said.

Yet Mullins added that the images of Columbus we learned in grammar school were built on the false ideas from the early 19th century.

Wolff believes the anniversary of Columbus coming to America is purely for promotional advertising.

And Higginson believes the only way society can change their views on Columbus day, is if the power structure changes.

Some University professors do not understand the connection between the students protesting in Memorial Hall with the Columbus Day holiday. Protesters in Memorial Hall are demanding the University to give 40 scholarships to low-income women of color.

"Memorial Hall had nothing to do [with the Columbus holiday]. I think it is an appropriate response for the students about the racial incident these past few days. I am quite upset about it," Wolff said. "I am entirely in support of women of color scholarships. I would like to see a great deal more students able to come to the University."

Yet legal studies professor Stephen Arons wonders about the the legal aspects of the scholarship.

"The University is right as far as the question of legality," Arons said. "But all the same, they could give the scholarship and let the court decide."

GLB students seek safe space through new hall

By JASON McDONALD
Collegian Staff

After many years of struggle by GLB students and faculty the "Two In Twenty Corridor," a program for lesbian, gay and bisexual students, began its first semester in Mary Lyons Residence Hall this fall.

Designed as a safe and nonthreatening living space for GLB students, the corridor hopes to eliminate much of the feelings of isolation felt by gay men, lesbians, and bisexuals on campus, according to residents.

"I don't want to have to fight for who I am," said Tony, a resident of the floor. "I'm here to get an education — I don't want to have to waste my time with people that are small minded."

The floor is not limited to gay men, lesbians and Bisexuals. Allies, or students who support the needs of gay, lesbian and bisexual students, are taking a major part in supporting the corridor and its residents.

"It's a corridor, but it's become a whole building experience as more and more people come out as allies and get involved," said Carol Carlson, the Residence Director of the Crabtree/Mary Lyons cluster.

The purpose and structure of the corridor will be decided by the residents.

Prof awarded fellowship

Dr. Budnik's nerve research continues

By SEEMA MALHOTRA
Collegian Correspondent

Dr. Vivian Budnik, an assistant neuroscience professor in the Department of Zoology at the University of Massachusetts, who was awarded a $30,000 research fellowship by the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation.

The Foundation was constructed in 1955 and was designed to give financial support to promising scientists in all fields who are beginning their research.

Budnik was nominated by Professor Rod Murphey, Director of the Neuroscience and Behavior Program for the award. She was one of 90 outstanding young scientists and economists chosen by the Sloan Foundation this year.

Budnik, 35, was born in Chile and studied there until coming to the USA to undertake her Ph.D.

"In Chile it is very hard to pursue a scientific career as it is an underdeveloped country," she said. "The only possible way for me to pursue science was to come to the USA."

She received her Ph.D in biophysics from Brandeis University in 1988 and in 1990 joined the faculty at the University of Massachusetts.

Off the beaten path: Sig Ep and Chi Omega

By CHRISTINA THORPE
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts community is well aware of the fraternities and sororities located on North Pleasant Street.

But a few are harbored in the lesser known Fraternity/Sorority Park. Located off East Pleasant Street, the Park is home to Sigma Phi Epsilon and Chi Omega, as well as the Mather Career Center.

GREEK AREA

Joe Hough, a senior electrical engineering major and a Sig Ep brother, has counted among the benefits of living in the park the ability of his chapter to have a "huge, great house." Overall, Hough said there is no trouble filling the house and the chapter does not have to impose any formal living requirements.

Chi Omega, the sorority house located in the park, is a large house that holds many sisters. But there is a two-year living requirement for members. Liz Belden, a senior English major, is in her fifth semester living at Chi Omega. Belden thinks Fraternity Sorority Park may be "off the beaten path, but we love it."

Janet Ferry, also a senior and member of Chi Omega, reiterated Belden's feeling. "Our house is off campus, yet it still feels like a home."

Transportation does not seem to be a hassle for residents of the park. PVTA loop buses run approximately ever 10 minutes during the week - although not at all on weekends, but many have cars of their own.

Being neighbors with Chi Omega seemed to be one of Joe Hough's favorite aspects of living in Fraternity Sorority Park.

"That's great. We're pretty much alone up here, so we plan a lot of functions together," said Hough. "It's good too because everyone in one house knows everyone else in the other."

Approximately 10 to 15 years ago there was an idea to move all the fraternities and sororities up to the park. Ed Korza, the active director of Greek Affairs and Student Activities, described the entire situation as "complex."

The University now owns several lots there which they once wished to rent to the chapters on campus. Each fraternity or sorority would build their own house on these rented lots, however many wished to own their land.

According to Korza, the physical upkeep of the chapters on North Pleasant was, at the time, not up to with faculty for not supporting him during this time. He also commented on the negative way police responded to his call, making him at times feel like the assailant and not the victim.

University officials, sensing potential danger, began enforcing the security policy last night at 6 p.m., contrary to the regular 8 p.m. policy. Over two dozen police had secured the building.

Students of color that entered the building were being acknowledged by having a check placed next to their names. Approximately ten students entered the building to post flyers bearing the words, "You Can't Keep A Good Race Down".

A number of students expressed their intent to directly approach the host of the alleged assailant and chanted, " 801, 801! ", referring to the host's room number in Washington.

At times, there were strong efforts to keep the crowd under control, by community leaders.

Tanya James said she was "frustrated" that more students were discouraged from speaking.

"The white students who signed the petition in support of Arlens should have attended the rally," said James.

Others felt that the white students did well in isolating themselves, "they could have been hurt."

As students of color marched to Morill, around 20 students blocked traffic on North Pleasant St., causing Police to erect barricades on either end of the street.

Later in the evening in Morill, students voiced their anger and frustration to several department heads, including Executive Director of Housing Joseph A. Zannini and Chief of Police John W. Luippold.

A question-answer session followed brief statements made by faculty, where members of the community addressed their concern for Barosy's safety and that of the community in general.

Place. Executives scheduled to appear include Boston Celtics' President David Gavitt, Art Berke, director of communications for Sports Illustrated and Jerry Colangelo, president of the Phoenix Suns.

Also attending will be executives from organizations such as Spalding, WEEI Sports Radio, Converse, the New England Patriots, the Boston Garden and the Boston Red Sox.

Attendance is limited to the first 500 applicants, ensuring a better than 10:1 ratio between speaker and attendee.

"With the limited attendance we provide an opportunity for attendees to meet the executives and network within the system," Wasson said. "People often walk out with three or four solid contacts in the professional world. People have the opportunity to sit across a table from David Gavitt and discuss the business."

Wasson says the opportunity to gain advice from the inside can prove invaluable to a college student who will soon be job hunting.

"Being able to check with someone on the inside, on how to do the right thing when applying, is helpful," said Wasson. "With someone giving solid direction to a college student while they're still in school will help them after graduation."

The convention costs $155 to attend and the fee includes breakfast and lunch. Interested attendees should call 800-776-7877 to reserve a seat at the symposium.

University standards, and thus did not project a positive image for UMass. The move was considered to be in the best interest of the campus as a whole.

Currently, the idea has basically been abandoned. Korza expressed his satisfaction with the maintanance of the N. Pleasant Street chapters. Within the last three years they have portrayed a more positive image with improvements in landscaping and overall appearance.

In general, Korza seems to be a supporter of the Greek Area and has voiced his opinion of how the institution had begun "appreciating the Greek Area for services they provide."

The Mather Career Center is also part of Fraternity Sorority Park. (The Career Center building was once a fraternity house before 1985.) Clark Edwards is the Associate Director of the center.

"The only rough edge with Chi Omega is parking competition, however it is no different then anywhere else on campus."

Edwards feels that the presence of Sigma Phi Epsilon and Chi Omega makes the center less isolated - especially at night. He expressed that his Greek neighbors were a positive aspect of the park.

Future plans may include a class and possibly an entire floor for gay, lesbian and bisexual students.

Due to a lower turnout than was originally expected, Two in Twenty's orignal plan for an entire floor was reduced to a corridor. The residents hope that with greater publicity, the floor will continue to expand.

As well as providing safety, the floor second of its type in the country, with the University of California at Santa Cruz the only other university to have such a floor.

"I hope other universities take our lead. I consider the corridor to be an excellent addition to the supposed 'diverse atmosphere' on campus," said Ellen Paleologopoulos, a sophmore STPEC major and resident of the Social Diversity Floor in Brett.

Residents of Social Diversity Floor have expressed concern that GLB students will not continue to request the SDF as an alternative floor to the Two in Twenty.

"The Social Diversity Floor was formerly a haven for GLB students," said Keith Kirkness, a senior psychology major.

"GLB students have had a great influence in creating a living environment for students who question mainstream American values," Kirness said.

Although arguments have been raised against the idea of seperate floors for minority groups, LBGA member Louise Godchaux said she believes they are necessary.

"Division between different peoples is a condition that already exists — we didn't create it," Godchaux said. "We would all like to feel integrated and safe within society. But until we acheive that we have to take one step at a time."

"This was a very enriching environment to come and work in," said Budnik, who plans to spend most of the money on equipment for the lab. "There was already a group here working in the area I'm interested in — that is, in the development of neurobiology."

Her research focuses mainly on the development of the nervous system.

"The question I am most interested in is how the nervous system developed," she said. "In a typical vertebra, for example, you have a trillion cells. Now the cells, during development, start growing and connecting to each other in a very specific way. The main problem is how do you make the trillion neurons join in this way."

Budnik is currently looking at a more simple network such as that of fruit flies, since working with a very complicated nervous system can be quite difficult.

"What I'm doing is using mutations that somehow affect the pattern of development of the neurons in these insects. By studying this I hope to find the mechanism by which the neurons form this precise network."

Although the emphasis in the work of Budnik and other researchers in the lab has been on nervous system development questions, they also work on other projects.

"One thing we are looking at is certain rhythmic behavior in animals, for example feeding behavior, and seeing which neurons are responsible for these actions," she said.

"However at the moment I feel development is a big enough problem - I will have my hands full for a very long time!"

UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AT AMHERST
Office of the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs
Whitmore Administration Building
Amherst, MA 01003

October 8, 1992

To the University Community,

Since the beginning of this semester, we have seen telephone harassment, racially biased graffiti and assault. The targets of these attacks have been Residence Assistants of color. This disturbing behavior has no place on our campus. We will not tolerate acts of racism, sexism, anti-Semitism, homophobia, and other forms of oppression. The university is dedicated to the ideals of access, equality and opportunity for all people. In a community which strives to recognize and respect the freedom and dignity of every human being, acts of intolerance hurt all of us, not just the individuals who are the targets of the actual acts.

Violence and harassment of any kind are not acceptable behavior on this campus. We will actively seek to punish persons identified as performing violent or harassing acts, as well as those found to incite others to such acts. We will pursue punishment through both the campus disciplinary system and the court system, as appropriate, and student hosts will be held responsible for the behavior of their guests.

While we are actively investigating the incidents that have occurred, there is a broader agenda that needs attention as well. Making this campus a better place to live, study, and work is a job that needs all of us. Only together can we establish a truly multicultural campus. Thank you in advance for your assistance in this effort.

Sincerely,

Thomas B. Robinson
Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs

This letter was originally written and dated Monday, October 5, 1992. We remain as concerned about these issues today. Please help us end the cycle of harrassment and fear, establishing a better campus evironment for everybody.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers or cartoonists and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

Was that the voice of God or was it just another bullhorn?

I thought I heard the voice of God Tuesday night.

As I neared the Fine Arts Center, an angry disembodied voice echoed off the building, damning the great majority of humankind and declaring that the time had come to make reparations. For a few moments I was duped, but as I listened I realized God would have had a better argument, not to mention a better sound system.

The Voice of the Bullhorn has been nagging at me ever since, accusing and judging and dividing. Seems a bit like a National Public Radio fund drive: a few people (11, in fact) hidden in a room, desperately trying to snag the attention and the support of the great masses. The broadcast is on, but no one's listening.

Only a handful of supporters have spent quality time on the lawn. Despite the appeals to sit and listen and show support and solidarity, most people just keep on walking. Sounds like a problem in communication.

The faces peering out of the windows see the folks walking by. And they're not happy.

"If you're just walking away, trying to ignore us, if you're White and. . ."

Um, what if I'm White?

According the bullhorn, it is my responsibility to fight racism.

Well, yeah, it's everyone's responsibility to fight racism. What does my skin color have to do with it? I'm still working that one out when the voice goes on.

And, says the bullhorn, if you are White and you're walking away, you're contributing to the violence against women of color.

Darienne HOSLEY

I pause a moment, and look at the disinterested faces trying to get by Memorial Hall as quickly as possible. I see many, many different colors, and they're all going away. Why are those with "white" skin singled out? There are many men and women "of color" rushing past; does their appearance absolve them of guilt?

How is going to classes "contributing to the violence against women of color?" Accusations don't win supporters; they turn people off, they encourage people to walk away. Declaring that "the majority of this campus is racist, sexist and homophobic" distances listeners. If you don't respect your audience, you won't have an audience.

I kept walking. And I fight racism. I try to relate to people on the basis of character, not color. Ethnicity is part of that character, but it is not determined by color. When I hear racist or sexist statements, I challenge them, I argue. Sometimes I can change an opinion and sometimes I can't. But I have found that honesty, respect and a just cause have a strong influence.

Anyone inspired to join a cause by bullhorn rhetoric isn't in the fight for the long haul. The "system" sucks, but yelling at it won't change it. Get into the system. Work from the inside out, and create meaningful changes that will lead to and support further goals.

It's silly to accuse a delivery person of supporting institutionalized racism simply because she expects the protesters to pay for their pizza. "Us and them" tactics won't work. Pissing off the administration won't work. Harassing students won't work. The demand for 40 scholarships? A little closer, but still off the map.

Joseph Addison said, "A man must be both stupid and uncharitable who believes there is no virtue or truth but on his own side." Keep your bullhorns. But don't accuse me of hatred because your way is not my way.

Where's Memorial Hall?

Most weeks I try to write about something interesting, but this week I'm writing about something I know you folks don't care about: the topic is the takeover of Memorial Hall.

Judging by the number of students (real students, that is) who have shown up in support of this takeover, I wouldn't be surprised if your next question was, "Where's Memorial Hall?"

Michael MORRISSEY

Memorial Hall is right between the Old Chapel and Herter Hall, and our professional protesting friends have decided to take this over to protest "500 years of violence against minority women."

Wait, folks, it isn't a takeover, but rather a "teach in" to reeducate us ignorant undergraduate students that Christopher Columbus wasn't a martyr. I don't know about you, but I don't think too highly of a navigator who accidently bumps into a continent on his way to India, and then, regardless of the fact he's a couple of thousands miles ahead of his destination, calls his "discovery" the West Indies.

All intelligent human beings agree that we shouldn't honor Columbus, a man who didn't "discover" anything. By killing thousands of Native Americans, he set a disgusting precedent by showing us we can't coexist with each other.

"So what does this have to do with the oppression of minority women?" you ask. Absolutely nothing. That hasn't stopped the professional protesters, however. They punched in on Tuesday afternoon during Archbishop Desmond Tutu's speech, going right to work by holding Memorial Hall hostage and demanding 40 minority scholarships for women.

By making such ridiculous demands, they assured themselves that their effort would fail, but that was probably a plan of theirs all along. This way, when Chancellor O'Brien says we don't have the $800,000 to fork over, they'll say, "See, this is another example of the oppressive acts of the White European male."

They're slippery, I'll give them that. The fact that they held the takeover five feet away from the Tutu speech in order to facilitate television cameras was evidence of their slyness.

So what's my point? Their whole spiel revolves around affirmative action, the fact that they think minority women are more deserving of scholarships than white men or women. Affirmative action is discrimination at its worst. I know many people who happen to be white who could desperately use a scholarship. They might be a little upset if their tuition was raised and it didn't go to benefit all students.

Besides the racist undertones of the movement, the professional protesters are forgetting one key point: there's no money! Even if this affirmative action ploy did go over with both Gov. Weld and O'Brien, the state simply doesn't have the money.

Guys, guys, if they pulled those 10 minority faculty positions out from under you, do you really think they'll give you a cool million for minority scholarships? I wouldn't pay one cent more for another liberal affirmative action scheme, especially one designed by these people.

I think student apathy is in general a bad thing, but in this case it's good. Please ignore protesters who scream out of the windows, "If just one of you goes home tonight and says, 'I'm going to stop raping minority women,' then we've done our job."

The ironic thing is that they've imposed themselves on the people who work in Memorial Hall by requiring standing guards at every door. Well, Memorial Hall is used for Telefund, which elicits donations for all of us, Black and White, graduate and undergraduate. In their zeal to conquer the next building, the professional protesters have lost sight of the real truth: they aren't helping a small minority, they're hurting all of us.

Postscript: I didn't dislike everything about the takeover; actually I thought the orange and blue banners were pretty neat.

Greek life isn't just a big party

To the author of "Brothers' games disrupt dorm [Collegian, Oct. 2]": you may believe that immaturity caused the behavior of Delta Upsilon, but I believe ignorance and misinformation are the only foundations on which you based your article.

Everyone on this campus has the right not to be awakened at 12:30 a.m. Why does this action (which occurs regularly to and by all members of campus) become ruder and more immature when done by Greeks? People look at members of fraternities and sororities as the narrow stereotype portrayed by media, film, TV and people like the author of Friday's editorial. They do nothing but perpetuate a negative attitude with ramifications of destroying one of the most beneficial and underappreciated organizations on campus. Brothers visit rushees' rooms to extend bids — not to hang out and have a wild party all night and to wake sleeping roommates. In accordance with Massachusetts state laws and Interfraternity Council rules on hazing, no member, pledge or rushee is ever, EVER forced to drink.

I agree that the whole story of the UMass Greek Area should be told. If you want to know the real story about being Greek, ask someone who is. The answer would probably include parties. But you would also hear of scholarship, philanthropies, activities, history, sisterhood/brotherhood, pride and the other opportunities that being Greek makes possible. Most importantly, you would hear about the friendships in the Greek Area.

Maybe you feel that it just isn't for you; that's fine. Just be aware that Greeks are normal everyday UMass students. They're in your classes, clubs, activities and dorms. There is something behind all those houses on North Pleasant Street with the strange letters on them. If you don't care to find out, care enough to make educated decisions and to voice informed opinions.

Funding decisions aren't sexist

Stacy Malone could not have a more misguided viewpoint [Collegian, Oct. 2]. The issue of funding programs versus capital procurement has nothing to do with men versus women. I may even agree that the allocations are ill-advised, but sexist no. Ms. Malone's frantic search for a conspiracy is a fool's errand.

The Everywoman's Center is a worthy cause, but so are minority programs, raises for teachers, etc. Over the past four years they all have been competing for a shrinking pool of funds. The shame of this is that we can justify spending millions of dollars for a rink, yet deny funding to teachers and minorities, groups which include their fair share of men, as well as women. If this were something like Men's studies (yeah right!) versus the EWC, I could understand complaints of sexism.

Unfortunately, no issue is that clear cut. Yet to explain that the new arena "probably was paid for at their [women's] expense," is completely unfair and makes assumptions based on prejudices that Ms. Malone accuses others of having. Women have no more financial stake in the arena than any other group. Ms. Malone's attempt to portray women as the only victim of misguided funding policies does not promote support, only antipathy for a close-minded viewpoint.

Please don't try to confuse a simple issue of mismanagement and opposing ideas of appropriate funding with sexism. It is insulting, narrow-minded and unworthy of a person truly dedicated to diversity and understanding.

Residents unite against racism

We, the resident assistants of Washington tower, were outraged and disgusted at the hate actions taken against our colleague, Arlens Barosy. He and the residents of the 17th floor became victims of harassment due to the immature display of some individuals' ignorance and insensitivity.

Our community has joined hands and minds to show our support for our friends on 17. We would like to publicly express that we do not accept and will not tolerate such repugnant behavior in our building, as well as across campus. As students at this University we have witnessed the many forms of ignorance (i.e. oppression) that exist here; they can be seen, heard and felt everywhere. Racism is an ugly, learned behavior that needs to be addressed, stopped and eventually eliminated. As originally stated by Target Enterprises, racism is curable with a healthy dose of cultural awareness and individual effort. Education is our key to ending this form of oppression, as well as all others.

We are strongly committed to building residence hall communities that are diverse, focus on academic success, and are based on the principles of respect and responsibility.

UNITY + DIVERSITY = UNIVERSITY.

Jeffrey Gaines: Lisa and Cutter go head to head

By LISA CURTIS
CUTTER GARCIA
Collegian Staff

Jeffrey Gaines
Iron Horse Cafe
October 5, 1992

CG: We were sent to the Iron Horse Cafe the other night to review some guy named Jeffrey Gaines (aka 'Soapbox' Gaines — but more on that later).

The band that opened was called Mr. Reality, a harmonizing trio from New Jersey who blew my doors off. Imagine a male version of The Indigo Girls — only with a third voice and better harmonization. If there's any cosmic justice at all these guys will appear on MTV's Unplugged. They were amazing.

LC: Uh-huh, Mr. Reality was adequate. The trio was at their peak when they sang/harmonized together, but when the lead singer pioneered on his own with a solo, it was a mighty uncomfortable experience for the listener.

Running with that idea of being uncomfortable in your seat, how about the lyrics to their song "In My Yard." "No matter WHAT/ we always made it UP/in my YARD." Okay, so they resurrected some childhood "doctor stories" in a set of impossibly bad lyrics.

CG: Lisa, are you suffering from a severe crack habit? Were you in the same room with me or were you too busy pining away for 'ol 'Soapbox' Gaines?

Mr. Reality performed their songs with both feeling and incredible sentiment. The song of which you mock is a beautiful testimonial to growing up and the letting go of things which were so comfortable to you in your youth. It's about the pain associated with realizing that the world isn't always going to be as rosy as it looks when you're 10 years old.

With Gordon Brown on guitar and vocals, Rob Tanico on bass and vocals and lead singer Peter Scherer singing together I was moved.

Mr. Reality was excellent. Everyone should buy their album.

LC: The only thing I will grant Mr. Reality is that their two guitarists had the best hair, incredible manes of hair really. But that is hardly enough reason to buy their six-week-old album. Their poster, maybe. Very marketable.

But for true, raw talent Jeffrey Gaines came to the rescue and wiped those Indigo Guys right off the stage.

Gaines, armed with nothing except a massive persona and his plug-in acoustic guitar, rocked the house. Clad in black and filled with similiarly dark anecdotes about his music and life, Gaines created an inspirational being on that stage that won't soon be forgotten by the 100 plus audience in attendance.

I'd already played his self titled CD, which came out earlier this year, about a million times. I knew all of his best songs, which was about every song on that album. He doesn't leave one important social/political issue untouched. In "Headmasters of Mine" he actually accuses the school system of brainwashing him in an attempt to help him succeed in society. His music is disturbing, sweeping, uplifting, soaring, toe-tapping and at times weepy. The audience couldn't get enough and yet the set went for two and a half hours.

CG: Looking for more rope, Lisa? This guy was more frustrating than a Rubik's cube in the hands of a kid with no thumbs. This guy has only 10 songs and he played for two and a half hours!? Let's do the math . . . 10 songs at six minutes apiece is 60 minutes. Throw in two covers at 6 minutes and you're up to a whopping 72 minutes. What happened to those 'Lost' 78 minutes? Jeez, I don't know — could it be the four hour segues between each song in which Gaines took it upon himself to bore the hell out of everyone in attendance?

Musically this guy is good, I'll concede that. I'll even say that I think he's going to be the biggest thing on MTV since Madonna's breasts. He's got talent both lyrically and musically, he's poseable and he's good looking — the perfect MTV package, he'll sell six million copies, easy. But the minute that he opens his mouth and starts off on one of his glorified, self-promoting, smug, soapboxy diatribes he's going to come crashing down quicker than you can say, "Shut up Sinead."

LC: Maybe, just maybe CUTTA, it's a nice change of pace to see a performer with some, oh I don't know, MORALS? Gaines is a performer with some semblance of maturity and a genuine desire to make the world a nicer place. Gaines has an agenda to push, but I like his a whole lot better than Cher pushing hair care products on late, late TV.

When I went to see him after the show, a mother was in there thanking him for giving her 16 year old daughter a positive image to emulate. That's pretty rare. I don't see too many moms thanking Judas Priest for giving their kid that extra push to suicide. Anyway, he does his preaching BETWEEN songs. His powerhouse vocals give vent to soulful, passionately inspired vocals that could move even the biggest obstinate fool. YOU, yourself said that it seemed at times that Gaines was moving inside your head. He understands the human condition, the twenty-something generation.

CG: First of all, don't be ranking on Cher. Gaines will never do for our country what "I've Got You, Babe" did. And yes, you're right, I did say that I felt he had moved inside my head — only he brought along a cheese grater to rend my nerves to shreds.

When a person pays good money to see a performer they're paying for the entertainment not the lecture. If boring lectures were at a premium it'd be even harder to get into a gen. ed. class than it is now. And why is that NOT the case, Lisa? Because when you pay your money at the door you expect to be entertained not bored.

I wouldn't have minded if he'd had some important message to share — but he didn't. He rambled about not liking to use rubbers (Gee, THERE's something I'm sure Mom was ecstatic about!), about how an ex-partner had screwed him over, about how cool he was now that he could rub his pseudo fame in his buddies faces and about his amazing past as a carpet layer. Shut up and play, Jeff.

LC: Who's on the soapbox, now? Gaines was masterfully creating a character on that stage, on a journey of musical and emotional exploration. At times it was like a roller coaster ride, at one moment we were soaring along with him and his pounding, all consuming passion for his art and the next Gaines was halting, unable to perform the next song, apologizing, "That one will hurt too much, tonight." He's so damned candid, he can't be damned for screwing up. That's a human being performing on that stage, not an MTV "product."

CG: Don't give me that. As soon as the folks from Diet Coke show up he'll be singing and dancing with dead movie stars in commercials. He'll sell out before the ink is dry on the check.

LC: Gaines is not nearly as vapid as you make him out to be. The one and possibly most important example of this is how he steps into the shoes of a woman in his song, "Choices." (Which he wrote, by the way.) He attacks the abortion issue without restraint with these lyrics, "If I don't want this life/ Then why should you/ A life without love is something/ An innocent child shouldn't be put through."

CG:I think that his message would have sunk in a lot further if I hadn't been nodding off, face first into my salad plate. By the time he got to that point, I didn't want to listen because he had bored me to death with his 'oh so cute' and 'whimsical' anecdotes.

Remember a kid named Peter, Lisa? He screamed wolf for a long time, so long in fact that when there really was a wolf nobody cared. I say entertainers should entertain, let them hold rallies if they want to preach. He was good — but he could've been so much better.

Native Americans in the cinema

By DANIEL A. BROWN
Special to the Collegian

This is the second of a three-part story discussing how Native American people have been portrayed in the contemporary American cinema.

A Man Called Horse (1969) — Eliot Silverstein, director. Richard Harris. Summary: In the 1830's an English nobleman is captured and enslaved by the Lakota. He slowly earns their trust, participates in their rituals and fights to defend them. The two sequels follow his return from Europe to reunite with the Sioux and the exploits of his son.

Plus: For mainstream moviegoers, this was their cinematic introduction to a sympathetic portrayal of Native Americans. There are a few memorable scenes here, especially the Sun Dance ritual in Return of a Man Called Horse (1976).

Minus: The plots are mired in your basic Hollywood package of gratuitous violence. Somewhat exploitative, especially the dreadful Triumphs of a Man Called Horse (1983) which featured starlets in buckskin bikinis! Several ethnological miscues such as the forest of burial scaffols on the the village edge.

Verdict: Not necessary to watch, especially with Dances With Wolves on video.

Soldier Blue (1970) — Ralph Nelson, director. Peter Strauss, Candice Bergen. Rated (R). Summary: Fictional western adventure derived from the infamous Sand Creek Massacre that took place in Colorado in 1864. In one of the most sordid events in American history, a unit of Colorado militia (led by a former Methodist minister) surrounded and destroyed a Cheyenne village camping peacefully under an American flag. Several hundred women and children were murdered and subsequently mutilated. The My Lai of the Indian Wars.

Plus: Truer to history in that it is the Indians who are massacred this time.

Minus: Considering the potential subject matter, the plot and acting are uniformly awful. The Indians are still treated as faceless savages and the massacre scene has

Spotlight on Jen Costello, a Judas wannabe

By CUTTER GARCIA
Collegian Staff

This week's Spotlight is on Jen Costello, an actress in the UMass Theater Department.

CG:Tell us a little bit about actress Jen Costello.

JC: Theater major from Malden. I'm a senior and I'm 21.

CG:List the roles you've played while a student at UMass.

JC:I played Lady Blues in A Torch Song Trilogy. Then I was the Baker's Wife in Into The Woods. I was Juliet in Romeo and Juliet and Shelly in Buried Child. This semester I'm doing Women of Trachis and I'm the leader of the chorus.

CG:You have a professional background. After having been trained at Walnut Hill Academy (a performer's highschool in Natick, Mass.) and working professionally do you find it hard to work with other students who don't have your background?

JC: Absolutely not, everybody here really wants to learn. You find out right away who is dedicated to their art and who is just there for the spotlight. Everybody I've worked with is dedicated to performing and perfecting their craft. Everybody here is on the same level — everyone just wants to learn.

CG:An actor's job is to present a 'reality' to the viewer. How real does the role become for you when you're up on stage?

JC: You never become someone else. If you believe you actually become someone else — then you're neurotic and you need to be put in a psychiatric institution. I am still always me when I'm on stage. The game we play as actors is called "The Magic IF," and that is, "IF" I was this person and "IF" I were in this situation — what would I do?

CG:What happens when you get the actor's nirvana? When you know that the audience loves your performance and if you want to lead them left, they'll go left and if right, they'll follow there too.

JC: The only time you can let yourself acknowledge audience approval is during the curtain call, and it doesn't happen all the time. One night during Romeo and Juliet — the place was packed — I came out to bow and I got a standing "O" (ovation) and I cried. It just blew me away. I wasn't expecting it, I didn't know what to do. I was in shock. I cried, I literally cried.

CG:Why did you choose acting and what does it mean to you?

JC: Well, I didn't choose acting to begin with. I was a professional dancer and I was in an accident and had to stop dancing — which was a heart break. But I was also a singer and since I moved into doing musicals from dance, my interests in theater grew from that. Walnut is where I really learned to love acting for the craft. From the beginning of rehearsals to the performance it's the most exciting, nerve-wracking, alive feeling that a person can have.

CG:What's the hardest thing about your art?

JC: It's emotionally draining, incredibly so. You have to call up real emotions for real situations even though you're not really the character. In Romeo and Juliet, every night I had to fall in love, run away and get married, find out that my husband has died and then kill myself. I had to go through that every night and by the end of the week I was drained. It was very draining.

CG:Let's flip the coin — what's the best thing?

JC: The challenge, the challenge of making somebody real [a character]. People who walk into a theater and have no connection with a show — they can get up and leave if you're not engaging them. Your job is to make them want to know what happened and how things turned out. And when you get feedback, when people say later, "And when you did this . . . I remember the time I felt the exact same way!" You go — YEAH! Yeah! — that's what I wanted to do!

CG: Your boyfriend is also an actor, is that a strange thing for you — sharing your personal space with another thespian?

JC: It's hard, it really is. The hardest part is going through the audition process together because nine out of 10 times we're going for the same production and it typically happens that not both of us are cast. And the difficult part comes when, like this semester, being dissapointed myself for not being cast in a show but having enthusiasm for him because he did. It helps our relationship because he's a great actor and I trust his instincts, his knowledge and his input about what I do. Having someone I know who cares about me and can tell me, 'You can do this.'

CG: What's the one role that you most want to play before your acting career is over?

JC: I really want to play Judas in JC (Jesus Christ) Superstar before I die, and I'm going to — I don't care where it is and I don't know who's going to do it — but I'm going to play Judas. JC Superstar is probably one of the only musicals that is seamless, it's perfect. I mean, from beginning to end, it's a rock opera, it's all music. And the roll of Judas, it's just out of control and I've got to sing it, someplace, public. I sing it everyday to myself, but I've got to sing it in public.

CG: Where will we find Jen Costello in five years? Where do you want to be?

JC: Yale University as a graduate student. I'll take two years off and then go back to study acting where the greats have been. Meryl Streep, Jodie Foster. That's what I want to do.

all the gravity of a fraternity toga party.

Verdict: Read Bury My Heart at Wounded Knee or see Little Big Man

Little Big Man (1971) — Arthur Penn, director. Dustin Hoffman, Chief Dan George, Faye Dunaway. (PG)

Summary: From the story by Thomas Berger. The fictional saga of 121 year-old Jack Crabb who spends his life ricocheting between the Cheyenne, his adoptive people (who name him "Little Big Man") and the Americans, his people by blood. As the West is "won," the Cheyenne fight bravely, but futilely against extinction. Climaxes with Custer at Little Big Horn.

Plus: In my opinion, the true "breakthrough" film about Native Americans which portrays them as real people. Chief Dan George gives and Oscar-level performance that has yet to be equalled. His choice of words tell more about the Plains Indians' world view that anything yet set to celluloid. The diversity of individuals within the Cheyenne is also well presented.

Drawing from an actual event, the most harrowing scene in this movie is the 1869 "Battle" of the Washita, where Custer attacked a peaceful Cheyenne village populated by the same unlucky survivors of Sand Creek! This is the movie Soldier Blue could have been. Hoffman is excellent as he dances through a lifetime identity crisis with coviction annd confusion.

Minus: Not as many Native American performers as could be possible and some of the Cheyenne women have hippie names like "Sunshine." The overlong plot could have done without some silly sequences that lower the integrity of the story.

Verdict: Still, a must-see. A good rainy afternoon video.

Freddie and Eddie strike out Mr. Baseball

By GREG ALEXANDER
FRANK BOUDREAU

"Freddie and Eddie are technologically advanced"
– Matt Roy, Engineering major

"Freddie and Eddie win the pennant!"
– Darrell Jasper, Sports Mgmt. major

"They're better than SEX"
– Hot Babe, 36-24-36

Celebrities testify that they never read their own reviews. Well, with reviews like this how can you not. Freddie and Eddie's first motion picture critique was greeted with overwhelming success. Sightings of our printed wisdom were reported from such respected places such as the over policed front door of the world famous Barselotti's, the sweat seeping walls of the valley's best gymnasium Flex Fitness Center, and believe it or not the inefficient and incapable Whitmore Administration Building. Satisfaction is for the weak, and weak we are not. The show must go on.

Our designated journalism assignment this week is the latest attempt at big screen fame by Tom Selleck, inappropriately titled "Mr. Baseball." Immediately this poses a universal problem. Tom Selleck is not Mr. Baseball, Bob Uecker is. Selleck is and always will be our hero, Magnum P.I. This case of mistaken identity on behalf of Hollywood producers is the foundation of our argument.

The talent lacking executives have effectively displayed their obvious ignorance by throwing a Louisville slugger in Selleck's hands and subtitles under his neatly trimmed moustache. It's similar to casting playful Pee Wee Herman as the Terminator. It doesn't work.

In Mr. Baseball, Selleck maintains the speed limit in an unimpressive Volkswagon Rabbit. Where's the fire engine red Ferrari travelling at the speed of light. The backround music creates the ambiance of your local Chinese restaraunt. Where's the unforgettable Eddie Van Halen style guitar solo? Jack Elliot (Selleck) or if you can, Mr. Baseball, hangs out with four foot Japanese baseball players who would lose to the little league team sponsored by Joe's Garage. Where's the helicopter flying T.C. and the nightclub owner Rick?

His love interest is the female version of Mr. Miyagi for she attempts to teach him the proper concepts of honor. The uneventful love scene went from an international kiss to the next morning, leaving the audience curious. We could not help but wonder if she knew how to wax on and wax off?!

If you reside in a remote cave located somewhere near Pluto and were unable to read our first column, let us recap our rating system. Freddie and Eddie have no gray area. You will not find any stars nor any thumbs, whether they be up or down. When we decide a motion picture is worth the two hour attention span we will enthusiastically endorse it and deem it Stupendous. However, if we decide a film stinks like egg foo yung gone bad, we will deem it Horrendous. If you haven't already guessed, Mr. Baseball is as bad as a virgin scorpion bowl. We, the new power generation of movie analysts, regretfully deem Mr. Baseball Hurrendous.

Supporting evidence further providing credibility to our opinions is necessary. The plot was an unstable and inconsistent course of events. After previous success in the "BIGS", Jack Elliot feels he is irreplaceable. He discovers that the fountain of youth has run dry and he is unexpectedly deported to Japan. Predictably, Elliot transforms from American primadonna to Japanese cult hero. The ending finds him happily back in the states with a new girl, new job, and a new perspective on life.

Japanese experience developed a better product in Jack Elliot. This idea betrayed my patriotism. After all, Mr. Baseball is an American film about our American pastime. Baseball is one commodity that will forever be colored red, white and blue. Japan will never be able to replicate and dominate this American export.

The script prevents Selleck from achieveing his maximum potential of coolness. Magnum P.I. was appealing to us for a decade because he lived by his own rules and successfully defeated authority. In Mr. Baseball he fails to remain unique and succumbs voluntarily to his manager. Ultimately, he betrays his loyal and trust worthy coalition that took years of syndication to establish.

Pessimism is not a characteristic of Freddie and Eddie. However, integrity is practiced in our journalism. We would love to be able to highly recommend a motion picture to our loyal audience but we haven't seen any of late. Our duty is to prevent the time conscience student from wasting precious moments on unworthy movies. Hopefully this week we have fully served you. This motion picture will fail to reach the post season. Do not support this losing effort. Mr. Baseball is headed for the dusty shelves of the new release wall in your local video store. Resist the shiny box and Selleck's masculine smile. Until the next time may the force be with you.

Water polo looks towards Easterns

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

After a layoff of 12 days, the University of Massachusetts water polo team travels to Brown University in Providence, Rhode Island for the second round of the Eastern League Tourney.

The 12-1, 14th-ranked Minutemen will play the following schedule tomorrow: George Washington at 9 a.m.; Army at 1:30 p.m.; Richmond at 4:45 p.m. Sunday's only game is at 12:15 p.m. against Bucknell.

"The teams we're playing may be a tier below us," coach Russ Yarworth said, "but their season will be made if they upset us. They're coming here focused on playing us hard."

Army is the only team from this weekend that UMass has already faced. The Minutemen won 11-7, and it would be surprising if any of the four teams will provide any more of a challenge than that.

The structure for the Tourney is very different this year. Last year each round was held at two different sites on the same day, with the top teams meeting in each round. This year, in order to assure that more teams are in the hunt, there are three sites for each round, and the top teams won't meet until the final round, November 7-8, at Navy. The top two teams after the third round will go to the NCAA Championship in California.

The break the team has been enjoying is also a change from previous schedules, an idea Yarworth came up with, but had no idea how beneficial it would be.

"Even though there was no competition the weekend off was very beneficial," Yarworth said, "because we were very sick. We had a flu virus that went through the whole team and we're just starting to get healthy."

Leading scorer Javier Gonzalez has been out for a few days with the illness, but will resume practicing today.

Even with the lack of game situations and not having practiced in a 30-meter pool for three weeks, Yarworth feels both he and the team are ready for the "real season" to begin.

"It's been a long break and it's like starting over," said senior driver Scott Reed. "It's been a long time since we've played a good game."

GAME NOTES - The new offense Yarworth implemented this year, combined with the relatively weak competition thus far, is really paying dividends in the scoring column. In 103 quarters played last year the team scored 233 goals. In the 52 quarters the team has played this year 184 goals have found the net.

I'm trying. In the other Hype Bowl last weekend, Louis Oliver of Miami made a huge contribution to the Dolphins upset of No. 1 Buffalo, and he deserves this more than anyone from the Eagles. He had three interceptions, including returning one 103 yards for a touchdown that buried Jim Kelly and the Bills.

New rankings this week: AFC: 1. Dolphins 2. Oilers 3. Bills 4. Broncos 5. Steelers.

NFC: 1. Eagles 2. Cowboys 3. 49ers 4. Saints 5. Vikings.

In the AFC, Buffalo was pitiful in the defense of number one, so they have dropped. The Dolphins were extremely impressive, and their offensive arsenal appears to be loaded. Houston, with a week off, benefitted from the Bills' loss, but stayed at number two.

In the NFC, the Eagles proved that they belong at the top for another week. Dallas succumbed big time on Monday night, but with the Redskins losing yet another game, and San Francisco barely beating the lowly Rams, the Cowboys are still second best. Minnesota and New Orleans are proving defenses that turn the ball over win games (see Dallas/Philly and Miami/Buffalo).

The Denver Broncos and John Elway have one thing that defeats opponents and makes Houdini jealous: magic. This traveling show goes to Washington, which is preparing for the changing of the guard in more ways than one. The Redskins are in need of a win, but who says their defense can stop Elway. I sure don't, and a win for the Broncos will put them as contenders again in the AFC. Denver 19 Washington 17.

Ray Handley's Giants come limping home to the Meadowlands without their starting quarterback Phil Simms, who is injured. Phoenix comes into this game off the upset of a former NFC East power, and Randal "Thrill" Hill is proving to be an exciting playmaker for the Cards. They are hungry, and the Giants are hurting. Phoenix 13 New York 10.

Atlanta and rejuvenated receiver Andre Rison have the unenviable task of traveling to Joe Robbie Stadium to take on the number one Dolphins. The Dolphins defense was huge last week, but they will not be as pumped against the Falcons. The Falcons' defensive backs are going to be running all day, and Jessie Tuggle may get the job of covering Keith Jackson. There may be a letdown for Miami early on, and the Falcons have to score early to keep a good team down. But, Marino and the gang are too strong for Glanville's red and black attack. Miami 31 Atlanta 24.

Jimmy Johnson has to wonder if his team is ready to bounce back from the beating they took on Monday night. Dallas is returning home to face the perennial average team, Seattle. The Seahawks have a new look on offense, and his name is Dan McGwire. Kelly Stouffer is out, and this is McGwire's chance to win the starting job. The gambling defense of the Cowboys is going to blitz him all day long. Expect his counterpart Aikman to embarrass the opponents. As a good friend of mine would say, I have four words for the reader: Dallas in a romp. Dallas 38 Seattle 14.

Arthur Stapleton is finally a Collegian columnist.

half of the season," Hixon said. "This game is critical because we'd like to explode into the second half."

In order to finish St. Joseph's off early, the Minutewomen will need the scoring technique of Ainslee Press, who leads the team with ten goals. Forwards Jenn Salisbury, Tara Jelley, Holly Hockenbrock, and Danielle Borges may also post big days.

However, the key for UMass will be the defense. If the Minutewomen play their normal strong defensive game and avoid any breakdowns, it will be lights out for the Hawks.

Goaltender Philippa Scott is shooting for her sixth shutout. Scott, a senior, holds a goals-against average under one and has been named the A-10's Defensive Player of the Week award twice already this season.

Still, the team isn't going into the game as an easy win. Hixon said she won't even think about the possibility of clearing the bench and allowing some of her second-stringers to see some action.

"Every time I think about doing that it seems we end up ,in a dogfight," she said. "We'll play as many people as possible but every person out there has to be ready for a dogfight."

Four season ticket packs for Mullins

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts athletic department unveiled its new basketball season ticket policy on Thursday which will coincide with the February opening of the $48 million William D. Mullins Memorial Center.

The department's four ticket packages, devised by interim athletic director Glenn Wong, ticket director Thorr Bjorn and other members of the athletic department, were especially difficult to put together because of the fact the Minutemen will be playing their home games in two arenas: the Curry Hicks Cage and the Mullins Center.

"We're in a unique situation," Wong said during Thursday's press conference inside the nearly-completed arena. "It's difficult because we're moving to a new building in the middle of the year."

The season tickets will be broken down like so: two packages, the "Sweet 16 Package" and the "Amherst Package," are only available for 1991-92 season ticket holders.

The "Sweet 16 Package" costs $199, and includes eight games at the Cage, four games at the Mullins with "preferred seating", three "preferred seating" games at the Springfield Civic Center: Cincinnati and the Abdow's Holiday Classic, and preferred seating at the Worcester Centrum against DePaul, for a total of 16 games. In addition, this package includes a post-season ticket lottery for the NIT or the NCAA tournaments.

The "Amherst Package" ($165) allows season ticket holders to renew their seats for the eight Cage home games and preferred seating at the Mullins Center for four games.

The other two packages are available for the general public. The "4 x 4 Pack" ($99) includes the four games at Worcester and Springfield in addition to the four Mullins Center home games, and the "Mullins Pack" ($56) is exclusively for the four Mullins Center home games. The "Mullins Pack" is subject to availability, as orders for the first three packages will be honored first.

Bjorn said that there will be no charge for undergraduate students in obtaining tickets for games in the Mullins Center. However, there will be options which may make the process for getting tickets more expedient.

One option is to run student IDs through an apparatus like those at the Dining Commons, an move that is bound to speed up a process which at times last year moved at a snaillike pace.

"Students will get one half of the seats," head coach John Calipari said. "They will get every seat on one side of half court, all the way right down to the floor. They should be given the same priority as season ticket holders."

The Mullins Center has a capacity of approximately 9,500 seats, which is more than twice the 4,058 capacity of the Cage. This means there will be 3,000 season tickets available to the general public.

Minutewomen defense as "impressive."

"Defensively they are very good," he said. "They play so well as a unit and they have tremendous heart, which is tough to beat. You also know UMass is going to get some great goaltending."

Daniels also feels, in order to win, his team must stop Massachusetts' All-American, Holly Hellmuth.

"She is clearly one of the best players in the nation," Daniels said. "She is so tough on defense and attacks really well. We will have to do something to contain her."

The Massachusetts attack of late has come from forwards Nicole Roberts (4 goals, 5 assists) and Kim Eynard (8 goals). Eynard is on fire, having scored five times in the past four games. She has six game winners on the year.

Rudy expects his team to respond to the added pressure of playing a top 10 team.

"This is our biggest challenge of the year, so far," Rudy said. "There is a little more pressure but we will respond to that pressure.

Both the Minutemen and the Mountaineers traveled to Rutgers, with the teams having different outcomes in New Jersey. West Virginia defeated URI 1-0, but lost to the Scarlet Knights 2-1.

UMass slid by the Rams in overtime, 3-1, and salvaged a 2-2 tie with Rutgers.

Minutemen to face conference rival URI

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

After a week off, the University of Massachusetts football squad travels to Meade Stadium in Kingston, Rhode Island for their second Yankee Conference game against an old nemesis, the University of Rhode Island Rams.

The Minutemen/Rams contest tomorrow will be the 67th in the series, which dates back to 1903 (UMass leads the series 33-31-2). Last year, URI won 17-14 on a Chris Cassara field goal with four seconds to play, so a victory tomorrow would certainly be sweet for Coach Mike Hodges and company.

"This is a huge game for us," said Hodges. "We certainly don't want our second conference loss so we're going to play this like a championship game. It would be great to go into homecoming at 3-1."

The Rams (0-2 YanCon, 1-3 overall) boast the most effective passing attack in the conference (273.3 yds./game) but will have to face a tough UMass defense, which is ranked second in passing defense (giving up only 138.6 yards/game) as well as second in total defense (329 yds/game).

That infamous defense will be spearheaded by linebacker Phil Lartigue, who leads the Yancon in tackles/game (45 tackles, 15.0 ave.), and the multi-talented Don Caparotti, who had seven tackles at cornerback against Boston University. Look also for outside linebacker Mario Perry (five sacks in three games), and left tackle (co-captain) John Creamer to have big games on D.

Offensively, redshirt freshmen Rene Ingoglia (5'11", 190 pounds) was the talk of the town last week after his 148 yd rushing performance - he'll start again tomorrow at tailback (splitting the time with John Johnson). Another redshirter, QB Andrew McNeilly, ran for a touchdown and passed for another against BU and is counted on to generate some points this week against URI.

URI's high powered offense will be led by junior quarterback David Nordstrom (replacing starter Tony Squitieri), and I-AA All-American tight end Darren Rizzi, who leads the YanCon in receiving (27-459 yds, 3 TDs, 17.0 ave.). UMass will also have to contend with wide receiver Chris Pierce, who is a formidible punt and kickoff returner (fourth in YanCon in pr's). Last year against UM, Pierce returned the opening kickoff 98 yds. for a TD.

"We need to win this game to have a realistic chance to be in the playoff hunt at the end of the season," said Hodges. "That's how our players are approaching it. We had an excellent week of practice so I look for us to come into this game strong."

Minutemen Notes: The game can be heard on WTTT Amherst (1430 AM) and WMUA (91.1 FM) with Jason Nash and Mark Smith starting at 1:30 p.m.

CHRISTOPHER EVANS / COLLEGIAN

Hard-nosed fullback/punter Mike George will be a key player in the UMass running game tomorrow, when the Minutemen travel to URI for a 1:30 p.m. game.

Women host A-10 foe St. Joe's

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team squares off against Atlantic 10 rival St. Joseph's Saturday at noon at Totman Field.

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

There are no pushovers on the University of Massachusetts field hockey team's schedule, but Atlantic 10 rival St. Joseph's is pretty close.

Which means head coach Pam Hixon and her troops will be guarding against an upset when they host the Hawks Saturday at Totman Field (1:00 p.m. game time). If all goes accordingly, the No. 4 Minutewomen (10-1) should handily defeat a St. Joseph's squad mired near the bottom of the A-10 pack.

"Hopefully we should get things rolling early," senior midfield Joy Blenis said. "This is an A-10 game, which alone makes it important. We can't take anyone lightly."

While Hixon realizes the Hawks (4-4-1) aren't a powerhouse on the level of Old Dominion, she said two factors make her wary of an upset.

"First of all, teams who aren't doing well always seem to play with extra emotion when facing teams who are doing well," Hixon said. "Secondly, it's a conference game, and there's a lot of pride which goes along with that."

A victory Saturday against the fourth place Hawks and a win next Friday against third-place Rhode Island will give the Minutewomen an undefeated conference record and the number one seed in the A-10 Championships.

"We haven't played for over a week, so it will be interesting to see whether we come out with the same hungriness and competitive spirit that we had in the first

Unbeaten women set to face No. 5 Hartford

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

For the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team, this weekend is the time to prove itself.

The Minutewomen are 11-0 and ranked No. 8 in the nation, but they must face their stiffest competition thus far when they host the fifth ranked University of Hartford Hawks (10-1) on Saturday at 2 p.m.

"This is a big one," Massachusetts coach Jim Rudy said. "Both teams are red hot with great records. This is the biggest game to be played at UMass in three years."

Hartford coach Austin Daniels said, "This should be a great game between two fine teams. There is not too much between us, we're pretty even, so it should be a nice competition."

The Hawks boast of a powerful scoring attack, which has pumped in 40 goals this year (UMass has scored 21).

All-American forwards Rose Daley (10 goals) and Kim LeMere (7 goals) lead the attack up front and have been joined by freshman midfielder Jessica Reifer (7 goals) to make up one of the finest offensive units in the nation.

"This is the most dangerous offensive team we've faced," Rudy said. "Daley and LeMere are as good as they come, they finishes so well. We will need to defend as a group, we can't let any of them hang out and go one on one."

Rudy will send the nation's leader in goalkeeping, Skye Eddy (5-0, 0.19 goals against average), into the net against Hartford. Daniels sees the Men travel south for two-game road trip

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

There is no looking back now for the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team.

Starting tonight at 7:00 p.m., the Minutemen (6-3-1, 3-0-1 in the Atlantic 10) enter a crucial two-game swing that should tell the tale of the rest of the A-10 regular season. Up first for UMass is West Virginia University.

UMass, coming into this contest, is 1-3-1 in its last five games, including a 2-1 setback at the hands of Northeastern Monday night.

The Mountaineers (3-4-1, 1-1 A-10) enter this game having won three in a row, the last two wins at home against Jacksonville, 4-3, and Robert Morris, 4-0.

West Virginia is led by scoring threat Aleks Lazic. In seven games, he has two goals and two assists, totaling six points.

Along with Lazic, the Mountaineers have a bombadeer in Keith Quill, who has taken 24 shots in eight games played.

The goalie for West Virginia is Mark Thienel, who boasts a 1.57 goals against average. He has one shutout on the year, and has played in seven of the eight games this year.

On Sunday, at 2:00 p.m., UMass continues its journey on the road back home, stopping at A-10 power George Washington (5-2-5, 1-0-1 A-10). The Colonials are undefeated at home (3-0-2), but have only won once in its last five games.

GW is led by freshman sensation Stephan Masten, who has 18 points in 12 games played. Masten's complement gets no worse in sniper Marcelo Valencia who has taken a team high 42 shots to go along with Masten's 38.

The goalie for the Colonials is Rob Christian, who has a goals against average of 1.24. He has 62 saves in 12 games.

Housing takes actions to ease racial tensions

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Staff

In response to recent racial attacks involving residential assistants, Housing Services denounced the use of threats and violence against RAs attempting to do their jobs and plans to train RAs on how to deal with "potentially volatile situations."

"Any time staff are resisted in the course of performing their job is unacceptable, adding elements of threat, intimidation or menace makes the situation intolerable," wrote Anne Miller, associate director of Housing Services, in a letter to residential assistants obtained by the Collegian.

"It is challenging enough to be a staff member without adding the possibility of discriminating language and threats," said Miller.

RAs are to receive specific training, she wrote, on how to maintain one's personal safety while defusing "potentially volatile situations."

The statement said Housing Services will also be using a locally-produced film to illustrate the difficulties of being a RA who is a person of color.

In order to make life for students living on-campus, Housing also plans to install peepholes in all dorm rooms over the next two years.

Student frustration over a racially-motivated attack on a Resident Assistant culminated in the storming of Washington Tower last week to confront several students allegedly involved.

In an apparent measure to appease protestor's demands, an agreement was reached that called for the immediate removal from housing of the occupant who had invited the guest who had assaulted a Black resident assistant last week.

Prior to this, approximately 300 students marched over to Morrill Science Building to meet with University officials to condemn the sluggish response of the University in dealing with recent incidents of racial attacks and graffiti.

University Police said they increased foot patrols this weekend and reported no arrests made in connection to weekend protests.

O'Brien flees race forum

Response to Washington incident called 'too late'

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Chancellor Richard O'Brien Friday walked out of a meeting meant to discuss racial tensions after declaring the forum had "deteriorated badly."

O'Brien had called the meeting in response to Thursday night's protests by students, for what they cite is a lack of security on campus for students of color.

O'Brien outlined a plan which included increased security in dormitories, sensitivity training for police and better training for resident assistants.

A group of students at the meeting were angered by apparent administrative inaction and declared O'Brien's measures as "too little too late."

The meeting came to an abrupt ending when O'Brien was cursed at by student Ranca Tuba, who has lobbied in the past for a student advisory board to oversee the department of Public Safety. O'Brien responded by saying "this meeting has deteriorated badly" and there was no need to continue.

Students reacted by blocking the rear entrance of the Campus Center Auditorium forcing O'Brien to be ushered out a fire exit by police. One student declared the act as "racist" while another student called O'Brien "the White kid's Chancellor."

Last night O'Brien said, "Before the meeting deteriorated, we had a useful discussion. I was sorry it ended like it did."

"It was typical, I'm not surprised at all," Alexander Nguyen, a continuing education student, said. "It publicly demonstrates his inability to deal with racial problems."

Student Government Association President Jennifer Wood said, racial tension had increased due to the meeting because the Chancellor had walked out.

"He didn't have thick enough skin to stay," Wood said. "People felt he thought they were inconsequential."

Students felt O'Brien was two weeks late in calling the meeting. Many said the meeting should have taken place immediately following the alleged beating of Black Resident Assistant Arlens Barosy by a White non-student.

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

An unidentified student addresses the chancellor at Friday's forum on race.

There was a meeting between students of color and administrators last Thursday but O'Brien did not attend.

"I should have been at that meeting," O'Brien admitted. "I was wrong."

Earlier in the meeting O'Brien admitted his administration should have acted sooner in dealing with a series of racial incidents which have occurred this

Exchange students seek opportunities at UMass

By NICOLE HOWARD
Collegian Correspondent

Why would a supposedly sane college student uproot his or her life and decide to spend some of their college career at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst?

Why not?

Approximately 110 students from all across the United States and Puerto Rico are doing just that. They are attending the Amherst campus for either the whole year or a semester through the National Student Exchange program.

Students' reasons for taking the "big step" and going on exchange range from getting away from home to taking advantage of the Five-College system.

"I wanted to see the Northeast and going to school at the same time was a really good idea," explained Stacey Dowell from Illinois State University.

For some, knowing someone who went on exchange encouraged them to get involved. Loreen Bernardini, from Chico State University in California commented, "I knew a guy at Chico State who was on exchange from UMass. He had a killer accent and made me want to come to UMass.

Coming from as far away as Puerto Rico and as close as New York, the students find that the area has much to offer. "There is so much to do and everything in this area is so close together. In the West, everything is spread apart so it takes forever to get anywhere," said Heather Westall.

The exchange students are taking full advantage of travel opportunities, both on their own and with the NSE Club. The club is planning its annual bus trip to Montreal in mid-November.

Because of all the opportunities, some of the exchange students have problems focusing on school. Being here is more like a vacation. Loreen Bernardini commented, "At home I'm into school and activities, but here I'm playing tourist. I feel like I'm at summer camp."

Though it has only been a few weeks, the students seem to have settled into the school and the area and formed their impressions of western Massachusetts.

For students from warmer climates the recent chilly weather has been a shocker. "I'm freezing in the middle of October." exclaimed Kristina Garnand from balmy New Mexico.

Regardless of the cooler weather, Stacey Dowell feels she has been warmly welcomed. "I was told that people might be unfriendly, but the opposite is true. People seem very laid back here."

The students have found many extra-curricular activities to participate in, from political volunteering and clubs to aerobics instructing and tutoring. "It's nice because there's a lot going on both culturally and educationally and there's so many clubs," said Pat Bousliman.

At least one exchange student has enjoyed UMass so much that she wants to stay

Peer pressure can prevent false alarms

By CHERYL LYONS
Collegian Correspondent

Red lights flashing the word "fire;" a clip-on lamp toasted to a light brown; a Sony stereo half-melted leaving the once dual cassette player with only one.

The University's Division of Environmental Health & Safety have used these tactics to grab students' attention during last week's Fire Prevention Week. Fire Prevention Week is observed across North America every first full week of October in memory of the Great Chicago Fire.

An information booth consisting of relics from a real fire, a video and safety brochures explaining fire prevention was set up at the Dining Commons and Campus Center Concourse this week. These activities were co-sponsored by University Food Services, the University Store and EH&S.

"A number of students have stopped to ask questions. It has been good," said Dave Beaudin, associate fire prevention officer.

Beaudin said the most common cause of fires are candles. "Candles have been left unattended, a curtain blows over it, or it just falls," Beaudin said.

Last year, there were about 118 fire alarms, according to Beaudin. "The number of false alarms have been down. There were only about 1.5 false alarms in the past three weekends."

Beaudin says this is due to the fire prevention materials made available every Thursday evening in residence halls.

According to Beaudin, the most effective way to prevent malicious false alarms is through peer pressure.

"When people's property gets damaged, there's peer pressure to not pull alarms or damage property."

The National Fire Protection Association, which is based in Quincy, Mass., has sponsored Fire Prevention Week since it was first established by President Harding in 1922.

longer. "I really like the school and it has my major, which are my reasons for wanting to transfer," said Miriam Wyman from Illinois State University.

The exchange students had words of encouragement for anyone who is considering going on exchange.

"If there is a chance, definitely consider seeing a part of America. It's a great opportunity," said Steve Roberts.

University students who are interested in going on exchange to one of 100 schools offered should contact Sheila Brennan in E-26 Machmer, 545-5351. Application deadlines are in February and a minimum 2.5 GPA is required.

semester. He said he was trying to speed up the handling of the Barosy situation.

"[The investigation] is moving far too slow and it should have been done by now," O'Brien said. "Nothing matters more to the campus than the safety of its students."

O'Brien told the over 200 people in attendance that those responsible for the alleged assault on Barosy would be "punished severely."

"That type of action will not be tolerated and we will hold both perpetrators and their hosts responsible," O'Brien said.

Some students said reactive steps were not enough and urged O'Brien to take steps which would ensure a safer campus for students of color.

"What you've proposed is damage control," Nguyen said. "With only one out of 10 students being of color you've set up students of color for physical violence."

Breaking from the meetings theme, Senior Malkes Gomes demanded answers from administrators on the loss of the federally funded Upward Bound program, which has provided scholarships for low income students who are mostly of color.

Gomes accused the University of mismanaging the program's funds, stealing the programs computers, using 1982 figures for 1992 reports and withholding the programs demise from students until students had returned home for the summer.

"You've lied to us and we have the right to know the truth," Gomes shouted. "Why were we lied to? Why was the information withheld?"

O'Brien denied the accusations and said, "I never lied, you know that is not true."

O'Brien said an investigation would occur and that the University was trying to find alternative funding for the program.

An unidentified student stressed the administrations lack of control over the entire situation.

"You have lost complete control over this campus," the student told O'Brien. "There have been racial attacks, riots have gone on, buildings are being occupied for half a week and people have not been arrested. Arrest these people."

Public Safety Director John W. Luippold, over the weekend increased foot patrols on campus following last weeks unrest.

Memorial Hall occupiers stage Columbus teach-in

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

After a week-long sit-in at Memorial Hall protesting the celebration of Columbus Day, about 40 students, faculty and community activists met yesterday at Memorial Hall for an all-day teach-in.

"Genocide is not a national holiday," said Shyamala Ivatury, a graduate student who has been protesting in Memorial Hall since the effort began Oct. 6. "No one celebrates the Jewish Holocaust or the bombing of Nagasaki or Hiroshima."

A reported six to nine protesters demanding 40 full scholarships for low-income minority women remained in Memorial Hall at press time. University officials have said they will not negotiate with the students until they leave the building.

Ivatury and fellow protesting graduate student Karen Adkins said the University recieved $9.8 million in federal and state funds over the summer.

"We are just asking that money be targeted toward [low-income women of color] than given out randomly," Adkins said.

Ivatury said the group of graduate and undergraduate students occupying Memorial Hall had been meeting for two months to discuss Columbus Day. She said they did not originally plan to take over the building.

Panelists discussed different topics from "Genocidal Warfare: The Legacy of Columbus Continues" to "Racial Conflict: What Does it Mean?"

"We just asked [the panelists to speak.] We are not paying [the speakers.] They do not want to celebrate [the holiday]," said undergraduate Alexander Nguyen, one of the teach-in organizers. "Because the 500 year anniversary is about violence against people of color. It is also about colonization. The two go hand and hand. It has not ended. There is violence right here on campus, but it is all over the world too."

Graduate student Bob Shapiro was one of the panelist speaking on "Violence and the University." He said the University is a "small part of a larger problem."

"We have to educate students. Yet students are doing a whole lot better than adults," Shapiro said.

African-American Studies Professor John Bracey was one of the panelists who spoke on "Racial Conflict: What Does it Mean?"

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN
Michealann Bewsee of the ARISE Homeless Shelter in Springfield participates in the Memorial Hall teach-in yesterday.

Bracey said society must get rid of Columbus Day. The city of Berkley, Calif., he said, changed the name of Columbus Day to Indigenous People Day.

"There has been discussions all around the country [about Columbus Day]," Bracey said.

Many in audience said they enjoyed the teach-in and some wished more of these learning experiences would occur more frequently on campus.

"I support the goals of the takeover. I think the teach-in is excellent," undergraduate Erika Higgins said.

Karen Adkins, a graduate student that is part of the Memorial Hall sit-in, also believes the name Columbus Day name should be changed.

Yet some listening to the panelists wanted to see more of a discussion between the audience and the speakers.

"I would like to have an open forum. Most of the people here already know this information," doctorate student, Libby Hubbard, said. "What we need to do is talk about the new world, not beating [the audience] over the head with the same problems."

Women's safety in crisis

Panel says violence rate has doubled

By STACY MALONE
Collegian Staff

They are run over by trucks, stabbed with ice picks, kicked, punched and raped with curling irons, said a speaker describing acts of domestic violence at a conference on women's safety at Hampshire College last Friday.

"I am describing atrocities that occur in domestic violence in every city in every state all over the world," said Sarah Buel, supervisor of Domestic Prosecution for the Norfolk County District Attorney's Office.

Buel spoke of her personal experiences with domestic violence, and cases that she has prosecuted at a conference titled "The Crisis in Women's Safety in the Valley," organized by Ellen Story, the state representative for the Third Hampshire District.

Buel said 1,200 women's shelters exist across the United States and 3,800 animal shelters, three times as many for animals than for women.

"How is it we have such a different standard for animals than we do for women?" Buel asked the group of approximately 70 concerned community members.

In 1987, one woman was killed every 22 days. In 1991, a battered woman was killed once every 16 days. This year, Buel said a woman was killed once every eight days.

"The community has to take the responsibility of domestic violence and take it off the shoulders of the victims," Buel said.

Buel said over 75 percent of the women who use emergency facilities have left their domestic violence situations and returned to them at least five times. "It is not about being stupid, it is about not knowing your options and who you can disclose to."

The obstacles which face women from leaving the domestic violence are: fear of their abuser, denial to minimize the situation and have hope of recovery for the abuser, low self-esteem caused by the abuser's isolation of the victim, economic dependency on the abuser and a need to protect their children, said Buel.

She said women have given men permission to use violence at home to get what they want. Men think they have the power to "straighten women out" and use their power and manipulation to have an abusive private behavior at home and a different respectable face in public.

Bush said on thin ice

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

President George Bush has little chance of getting re-elected, according to Jeffery L. Sedgwick, University of Massachusetts political science professor and former White House official .

."Bush has not said what he is going to do. I will be surprised, if he gets re-elected," said Sedgwick, Reagan's Bureau of Statistics deputy director. "If he gets re-elected, it will be by the skin of his teeth. I see no ring of endorsement by the American public."

In addition to being discontent with the present form of government, Sedgwick believes voters are not satisfied with their choices in the presidential race. Yet he believes the way the campaign is being run is adding to voter dissatisfaction.

"This is a non-campaign. There are a ton of good issues we could talk about such as economy, defence, etc. But nobody is talking about the [main] issue. The issue right now is the deficit," Sedgwick said. "You have to raise taxes and cut spending or some combination of both. You can not spend your way out of the deficit."

Clinton's raising taxes on the rich is silly, according to Sedgwick. He believes the deficit is too large to be solved with only raising the taxes on the rich.

"[The voters] want to lower taxes and I can understand that," Sedgwick said. "But at a certain point we have to realize there is no Santa Claus."

In addition to being skeptical of Clinton's tax program, Sedgwick believes electing Clinton will be putting another Jimmy Carter in the White House.

"If Bill Clinton gets elected, it would be a Jimmy Carter all over again," Sedgwick said. "He will arrive in Washington with no mandate to do anything. He cannot raise taxes. He cannot cut spending. Well, is that the kind of change you want?"

Yet Sedgwick, who is planning to vote for Bush, feels a Republican president will still be part of the deadlock in Washington.

"If Bush gets elected it will be a lame duck president," Sedgwick said. "He will have no mandate and he will spend four years vetoing everything in sight."

Although Perot seems like the only candidate to have paid attention to the deficit, Sedgwick feels that Perot would be a bad president.

"He is a control freak," Sedgwick said. "He would be a disaster as the president."

Sedgwick believes we must have stronger political parties because political parties govern the country. Candidates just want to win the election.

UM Christian fellowship aims to overcome campus division

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship met yesterday afternoon to discuss the issue of racial harassment and its impact on students.

Riots come from deep rooted anger and it needs to come out in some form, however it's the direction that can be potentially dangerous, said Jenny Martin the group leader.

Martin also stated that we need to identify this anger, understand it and come together to work things out.

Martin says that the after-affects of the racial unrest on this campus leaves a lot of people isolated and divided.

"Students shut down and are to afraid to come together. We must try to do something to make sense of this chaos. It would be a mistake to do nothing, said Martin.

The group talked about planning an all White teach-in/symposium on racism and discrimination.

"This is a positive way to get White students to be open and discuss the problems of race and to be more consciously and cognitively aware and deal with their own feelings of discrimination.

Kristine Dodson an, exchange student from Oregon state who is studying French, believes that race is one of the outcomes of cultural prejudice.

"Disabled people also face widespread discrimination. We need to address all social injustices and how they affect us all," said Dodson.

Martin believes that the issue of race relations has always been seen and addressed as an external problem.

"We need to see race relations as central to the Gospel of Jesus Christ and not just viewed as an external movement.

Jesus set the example for us to follow, He came to bring lasting peace and real change," said Martin.

Kristen Timothy, a junior botany major, says she feels that the perception of God as a select God has a lot of people confused.

"Its important to let students know that God is for everyone on this campus, said Timothy.

Greg says he feels strongly for those who have been victims of discrimination.

The Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship meets every Wednesday from 12:30 a.m. until 1:30 p.m. for prayer. The group also meets every Friday at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center for Bible study, fellowship, prayer and worship. All students are welcome to attend.

The group agreed that students must take an active stand to examine ourselves and how we relate to each other.

"Our own aggressive education and personal growth is key and a first step," said Martin.

Martin also believes that Christians must make a difference and break stereotypes. "We are going to make mistakes and be venerable to this crisis, but we want to try and reach out and be there for the students and the community," said Martin.

Valley Women Martial Arts, stressed how important it is for women to develop skills to protect themselves. She said women who fight back in some way are often successful in getting out of the dangerous situation.

Aalfs said her self-defense skills have taught her "the reason I can walk alone is because I know I am not alone".

Mary Kociela, director of the New England Learning Center for Women in Transition, said "We have to be as loud as we can be in educating against the myths we have learned about women." There has to be "a major shift in all of our thinking." She said we have to get information out to the public and inform them about domestic violence in order to have a community response.

Judge Bertha Josephson, associate justice of the Massachusetts Trial Court of the Chicopee Division, offered solutions to end domestic violence.

"We need to join together. We need to resist scapegoating each other and blaming one another," said Josephson. "We must focus our energy on the solutions to our problem."

"Each of us has a piece of the answer and bringing those pieces together will make our society safe."

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

IF YOU THOUGHT COLLEGE WAS EXPENSIVE, TRY PUTTING YOURSELF THROUGH RETIREMENT.

Think about supporting yourself for twenty-five, thirty years or longer in retirement. It might be the greatest financial test you'll ever face. Fortunately, you have one valuable asset in your favor. Time.

Time to take advantage of tax-deferral. Time for your money to grow.

But starting early is key. Consider this: if you begin saving just $100 a month at age thirty, you can accumulate $192,539* by the time you reach age sixty-five. Wait ten years and you'd need to set aside $227 a month to reach the same goal.

At TIAA-CREF, we not only understand the value of starting early, we can help make it possible—with flexible retirement and tax-deferred annuity plans, a diverse portfolio of investment choices, and a record of personal service that spans 75 years.

Over a million people in education and research are already enrolled in America's largest retirement system. Find out how easy it is to join them. Call today and learn how simple it is to put yourself through retirement when you have time and TIAA-CREF on your side.

Some 'right' realizations

Another Saturday night and I was dying in front of the TV when Bill Clinton's slightly puffy face appeared and began to castigate Pappy Bush for his execrable record; this pleased me. Being a boor and a glutton for punishment I began a political conversation which wound through some rather dark streets. These discussions are usually trying and sometimes quite painful. Not this one; tonight's was truly wondrous and it led me to the light.

C. APPLEGATE

Mr. Clinton made some soothing, if erroneous, statement about his intention to renew our country's lifelong commitment to aiding the disadvantaged. I laughed coarsely; the Populists were the first major political party to even propose that the feds help out the little guy and that wasn't until 1892. Cynically, I suggested that our government has a longer record of holding the little guy down while big business savages him than of giving We the People a helping hand. I followed these offerings with a vehement berating of the GOP and its Draconian domestic policies.

Looking back on those few misspent minutes, I now feel ashamed of myself. Little did I know how far off the path of righteousness I had been steered by the perfidious lies of the Liberal Left. I shudder to think what could have become of me had my friend's roommate, Egalitea, not been there to save me from myself.

As her eyes swung up to meet mine, they were filled with rage but they softened when she saw how badly deceived I had been. She recognized the evil teachings of the Liberals and, kind souls that she is, resolved to aid me in my time of need. She began my tutelage immediately; after all, the election was close at hand.

First she told me that there really is no economic problem in America. The distribution of our wealth, I now know, is as close to the Marxian ideal as the world has ever seen. The solution to our deficit crisis? Cut all social spending programs. Completely. It isn't the government's responsibility to help the citizenry, Egalitea said; people have to look after themselves.

The purity and splendor of this revelation so stunned me that I forgot to ask what the government's responsibility is, but no matter; I know our elected officials will do right by us, even if we aren't sure just what they're up to. They're doing fine right now, after all. The recession is almost over; prosperity is just around the corner. I guess all they're supposed to do is tax us so the police can afford to keep us all in line.

The best news of the evening, however, was the information on how to solve poverty. Egalitea really set me straight; I have been educated. Now when I see a homeless person or a family shopping at the Salvation Army I will respond with a shudder of revulsion; I will pelt them with rocks and oaths. Their condition is their own fault. If poor people weren't so lazy they could get jobs and support their families. Single mothers? We all know what kind of amoral scum they are. They don't deserve our support for their sinning. As for the underemployed trapped in menial, minimum-wage jobs. . . well, they've got no one but themselves to blame. If they had any initiative they would go out there and get real jobs, like research scientists and bank presidents.

Welfare and other similar programs just hurt these people, Egalitea told me. They are inherently lazy and shiftless, a problem caused by deficient family values and maybe racial factors that we haven't been able to isolate, but know exist nonetheless. Thanks to her I now know that these people need a proper incentive to make them work, like debtor's prison or dying of scurvy. Welfare payments just encourage them to continue leading a dissolute life of luxury, eating canned corn and chicken necks in their condemned tenement buildings.

Let me tell you, I was sure relieved to hear all this. Here I was getting all worked up over nothing! I can't do anything to help, whether I want to or not. The real problem is the selfish, lazy people who want to be supported for nothing and all those bleeding-heart liberal types who actually think that we, as human beings, have some kind of moral obligation to keep our fellows from starving to death, illiterate and cold, in the most prosperous nation on earth. To think I almost fell for it!

C. Applegate is a UMass student.

Act on your beliefs or be ignored

Regardless of our personal opinions about Columbus Day, the recent attacks and protests in Southwest, or the protest at Memorial Hall, most students are aware by now that there are many conflicts at UMass and that there are people willing to act on their beliefs. We are all also aware that there are serious conflicts between the people that make up this country. These divisions are more real for some than they may seem for others: many people are able to wear blinders and pretend that prejudice, racial and ethnic divisions do not hurt us all. At the same time our country is the self-proclaimed champion of democracy around the world.

As University students we have privileged access to formal education as well as to all of the University's organizations and resources. As Americans we are privileged to be able to congregate and try to change our lives without immediate threats of torture, imprisonment or being shot at. Let us not abuse these privileges by not making use of them. Democracy is not about sitting and waiting for the person next to you to do something. Open your eyes. Do what you can, now.

Different lives, same fears existing in the same tower

"If one is dehumanized, we are all dehumanized and humiliated." — Archbishop Desmond M. Tutu

Unlike last week, there were no crowds of angry students. There were no visible signs of police. Washington Tower, like most of the campus this weekend, was eerily quiet. If you hadn't known about the last few weeks, you'd think it was picturesque.

David RIVERA

Arlens Barosy sat in his room alone, thinking about how his life here at UMass had changed so drastically. Barosy was the residential assistant that was racially assaulted and humiliated by a person invited into the tower. He sat with a sad look on his face, recalling the recent events that have changed — not only his life at UMass — but many other lives.

"I thought when I came to UMass that this was going to be a great place. . . all I found was hatred." He said while shaking his head.

Barosy has to be escorted around campus. He's fearful of what might happen because of what has happened. He spent most of the weekend locked in his room.

There was a knock and Barosy looked up quickly at the door as if something could be wrong.

"Who is it!" He asked sternly, waiting for a reply before opening it. A friend was just seeing how he was doing. Barosy seemed relived.

You see Barosy, originally from Haiti, feels that slavery has ended but, "mental slavery" still continues.

"When I came here I was Black first, and a person second," he said recalling when he first came to the states.

Barosy just shook his head in frustration, and sat alone in his locked room.

Michelle Williams also sat in her room, barricaded in on Thursday night. Angry students fed-up with administrative rhetoric stormed Washington Tower in protest of its lack of action in prosecuting Barosy's assailant.

That night, police who had to patrol the dorm, told Williams to stay in her room and not come out. She also had her door locked and was scared to open it.

The problems here at UMass are old and instituted. Racial incidences like the one in Washington Tower will happen again unless a real understanding of cultural differences are taught in our schools, not just in college but in kindergarten.

Wanting to be a journalist for some time, I thought I knew a great deal of journalism history. But it wasn't until I came to college, and took an Afro-American Studies class, that I learned of the great African American journalist, Ida B. Wells.

Wells during the turn of the century, risked her life to catalogue the lynchings of the South. I should have learned her part in American history in grade school, not in college.

Stopping the ignorance of racism starts with the young and we owe it to future generations of the world not to teach such hate and ignorance. We ourselves have to address our own problems with racism. Before we can teach properly, we have to learn properly. It's a fact that people are not born racists, they're taught to be racist.

Arlens Barosy and Michelle Williams, two UMass students of two different worlds. One Black, one White, and ironically enough both with the same fears. Both feeling that the school's administration has completely lost control of the situation. Both feeling scared and confused. And sadly enough, both with their doors locked.

It's time to open the doors.

David Rivera is a Collegian columnist.

We must watch for ignorance

When I sit here and think about the one word that really bothers me the most I wonder why it is still used, and I wonder if the people who use it really understand what they are saying? I am of course referring to the word Nigger. The word that was scrawled on the wall near a Black RA's room, Arlens Barosy.

This is pure ignorance. Are we not a civil society living in 1992, or are we still living in the '60s? There have been no arrests so far, why? Perhaps they think it would not look too good for the department or the town? What if the roles were reversed? a group of Black adults beating up a White RA? The police would probably search every Black person's dorm room until they found every one of them. Or if they couldn't find the suspects they might simply arrest any Black person as they did in the Carol Stuart murder case.

I encourage everyone on this campus to do the work the police, and housing has been slow to do. Look out for these incidents, report them immediately, call the police but hold the ignorant bastards, physically if necessary, until they arrive to arrest them. Maybe this will make others think twice before their actions. There is still not enough justice in our world, it's sad but true.

Racism is a great sign of ignorance and for the people who commit this crime a warning you might run into the wrong person or group some day.

Who was this Columbus, really?

"In the year 1492, Columbus sailed the ocean blue."

All of us have heard this phrase in one way or another, and by now we all know what Columbus did and what he stood for. This is a rare time. On the eve of the Quincentennial, many of us will be choosing sides and arguing fiercely for what we believe in, arguing for what Columbus means to us.

To most people, Columbus is a symbol, that of a hero or a villain. A hero because he sailed through uncharted waters with bravery and a spirit of adventure. And a villain because he was the cause of the genocide of the majority of the Native American population.

What I'm concerned with, however, is just one issue. Who was Columbus really? What was the man like? It seems to me that a lot of people don't realize or don't consider the fact that he was a human being.

Many people don't know about his obsession with finding India across the western sea, how it consumed him and ate at his soul. He was supposed to have been rewarded greatly for finding the new world, but of course never was. All of his hopes and dreams of a life of ease and luxury were shattered when he was told that the New World was a disaster. After his fourth voyage he returned home to die in disgrace and obscurity, a failure.

To me, Columbus was a product and a victim of society, that being the uncaring aristocracies of Europe.

Peruvian rebel Guzman behind bars

Bimael Guzman, a Peruvian revolutionary leader hungry for power, who vowed to obtain his goal by whatever means necessary, regardless of how brutal and unorthodox these could become, was finally captured.

He is now watching sunrises from a rather different angle-behind bars. This capture took place in an modest house in one of Lima's neighborhoods. It was, surprisingly enough, a bloodless process.

Guzman was the leader of the guerrilla group called the Sendero Luminoso, Spanish for Shining Path, which has terrorized the country for the past 12 years. Its attempts to gain power over Peru were many throughout this decade, and this group is considered by many to be the most radical leftist movement still in operation in the world.

Sendero Luminoso's approaches to obtain its goals are very violent, and it is estimated that the group is responsible for 25,000 deaths, as well as 22 billion (U.S. currency) in damages. The group is famous for brutal attacks, random destruction of property, and numerous assassinations.

Sendero Luminoso has gained strength throughout the years because its ideologies surround Guzman himself who has become, to his elite, a legend of determination, courage and success. Its fighters are diligent and completely dedicated to the cause of the movement, characteristics that are fundamental in constituting a strong unit.

Inês
VIEIRA

Although the Peruvians might have felt some degree of relief upon the capture of the Sendero Luminoso leader, it is thought that such feelings will soon be replaced by fear.

The Shining Path movement might weaken somewhat due to the abrupt loss of its leader, but it is much too strong to become eradicated once and for all. For a while, the attacks and the fear may lessen in degree, but once the psychological impact has been dealt with and the movement has had a sufficient time to reorganize itself, it will arise and do everything in its reach to free its leader, and even possibly retaliate.

Peru has been "victim" of the Shining Path movement for over a decade now, and one would be inclined to think that capturing Bimael Guzman represents a victory for the Peruvian government, and that there is finally a chance that radical leftism be eliminated in this country. Although, Peru's current political doctrine is not far from leftist, since it is a pseudo-dictatorship imposed upon by its President Alberto Fujimori.

Peruvian government tactics under the leadership of Fujimori have been controversial. Security forces have, in the past, used torture, shootings, and randomized arrests as methods to fight the guerillas.

Fujimori's controversial ideologies and his techniques have lead the country to widespread poverty, weak nationalism level, and even resentment over the social instability that is dominant in Peru.

It will be a fairly complicated process that of reinstituting peace and social as well as economic stability in Peru.

While the potential threat of the Sendero Luminoso is an evident concern in the lives of Peruvians, and Fujimori's tactics of leadership no longer present a motive for instability in Peru, peace and possibility for economic improvement in this country, at least for the time being, might seem to be far-fetched goals.

Israel resists attempts for new talks with Arabs

By EILEEN ALT POWELL
Associated Press

Israel said Thursday that it will accept the participation of Palestinians from outside the occupied territories in the regional Mideast peace talks.

The announcement by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres followed meetings by Egyptian Foreign Minister Amir Moussa with Israeli leaders. It was seen as a step forward in stymied Arab-Israeli peace negotiations.

Peres said that those Palestinians taking part in the regional talks could still not belong to the PLO's parliament in exile or come from Arab east Jerusalem. Israel still opposes the inclusion in the main peace talks in Washington of Palestinians from outside the Israeli occupied territories.

Israel had refused to attend multilateral talks on refugee problems and economic development because exiled Palestinians had planned to take part. It had agreed to attend three other sessions on regional issues. "The agreement is that the Palestinians who participate in all the five committees can be from outside the territories", Peres said.

Israel objected the attendance at the multilateral sessions by outside Palestinians because it feared this could revive demands by those exiled with the founding of Israel in 1948 to return to their former homes. The participation of the so-called diaspora Palestinians also hints at the involvement by the Palestinian Liberation Organization.

Peres made the statement after a day of meetings with Moussa, including a second unscheduled session between the Egyptian diplomat and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. Egypt has encouraged Israel to soften its stance and the announcement indicated Cairo's success at mediation. Israel objects to any role for Arabs from the eastern part of Jerusalem because Israel annexed the land after seizing it from Jordan in the 1967 Middle East war.

Thursday's decision did not affect Israel's refusal to accept diaspora Palestinians in the main bilateral peace talks Israel is holding with Syria, Lebanon and a joint delegation of Jordanians and Arab residents of the occupied West bank and Gaza strip.

" There is a progress that has been achieved and we are looking forward to more consultations", Moussa told reporters after meeting Rabin at the Israeli Defense Ministry in Tel Aviv. It was not clear what Israel would gain from its decision. Moussa met earlier last week with PLO leader Yasser Arafat, but it was uncertain if those talks were related to Thursday's Israeli announcement.

Syria has since boycotted all multilateral peace talks, maintaining that progress must be made in the direct negotiations before it would take part in discussions of regional issues. The Syrian-backed Lebanese government has also boycotted these sessions.

News reports had said that Moussa's visit was intended to help arrange a summit between Rabin and Syrian President Hafez Assad, but no announcement was made regarding such a meeting.

15-year war ends in Mozambique

A Peace Treaty was signed last week in Rome, putting an end to 15 years of war in Mozambique. Mozambican President, Joaquim Chissano and RENAMO leader, Afonso Dhalakama, worked together so that peace and order could once again become the dominating forces in this South Eastern African country.

The negotiations were not easily resumed. The process began in July of this year, and ended on the night of Oct. 4, after six long hours of uninterrupted talks.

The actual signing of the agreement was predicted to take place on the first of this month, but it was postponed due to last minute demands set forth by the RENAMO.

In addition to the two leaders in Mozambique, various other key participants were present during negotiations. Among these were several worldwide government officials, namely, Emilio Colombo, Italian Chief of Diplomacy, three Italian mediators, Mario Rafaelli, and two representatives of the Community of Santo Egidio, D. Matteo Zuppi and Andrea Ricardi.

Also present were the archbishop of Beira, Jaime Goncalves, Portuguese Secretary of Foreign Affairs, Durao Barroso and United Nations' James Jonah.

The signing of this agreement was only possible after long and continuous negotiations on the last four protocols, these dealing with the issues of military capabilities, the actual cease-fire, warranties, and the proposed conference of countries expected to aide in the process of rebuilding Mozambique.

Inês
VIEIRA

Among the agreement outcomes are the demobilization of the countries two armies and the creation of a sole army of 30,000. The negotiations also facilitated the future holding of legislative and presidential elections, expected to occur within the next year. The format is somewhat similar to that of Bicesse, which has successfully headed Angola to an era of peace.

As a direct result of the agreement, Humanitarian aide from the United States estimated to total $200 million will be allocated toward the assistance of the Mozambican population, which has been severely affected by war, widespread famine and drought. The estimated total number of casualties resulting from the above described conditions is 600,000, and there are hundreds of thousands of refugees.

Italy has taken the initiative of promoting a conference consisting of representatives of various countries that will be directly involved in the upcoming war aftermath. These nations agree to aide in several ways, such as in the demobilization process of both armies, and financially supporting the emergent political parties.

Although reaching this agreement between the Mozambican government and the RENAMO, was a long process, it has now successfully resumed. Joaquim Chissano said during his final speech that the agreement could have been a "happier" one, but nevertheless he is pleased since it has satisfied both parties in question.

Perhaps the best outcome of all is that Mozambique will experience life without war. Hopefully this condition will last, and along with the foreign aide and national incentive, a stable environment will arise to facilitate the rebuilding process of a country that has for a decade and a half faced the hardships of constant battle. The two leaders of Mozambique referred to each other as "brothers" during the negotiations final stages. The world and especially the Mozanbicans hope that these new found terms of "brotherhood" lead to a true renaissance of another African country that has been devastated by war.

'Rockin' in Rhythm:' Marsalis & Co. swing

COURTESY FINE ARTS CENTER
Wynton Marsalis (top right) and the Lincoln Center Jazz Orchestra

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

While racial tensions ran rampant all over campus last Thursday night, The Lincoln Center Jazz Orchestra surpassed cultural barriers to celebrate and play the music of the legendary Duke Ellington.

The 16-member orchestra directed by David Berger played pieces from all periods of Ellington's 50-year career, featuring amazing solos by the musicians.

Artistic Director/trumpet master Wynton Marsalis and trombonist Wycliffe Gordon played a lively duet in Ellington's 1928 "Black and Tan Fantasy." Not only did their instruments sing dialogue from during this swanky tune, but Marsalis' trumpet so closely resembled the voice of Louis Armstrong that I almost expected to see him up there.

"The Daybreak Express" focused on the common train theme in Ellington's day and provided a unique and funky interpretation of a surprisingly accurate steam train. From the turning wheels to the toot of the horn, every movement was represented. A trumpet solo by Marcus Belgrave further contributed to making this piece one of my favorites.

Special guest vocalist Milt Grayson resonated a deep, rich soulful "Nothing But the Blues." My imagination took me back in time to a dark, smoky club with tiny tables crowded closely around a small platform upon which Grayson stood, singing. As with so many of the songs, I was swept away to an era of speakeasies where patrons went to see, hear and feel the blues.

In "Boy Meets Horn" Marsalis evolved from a timid boy experimenting with his first trumpet to a roof-raising trumpet virtuoso. The in-between stages of increasing confidence and sheer pleasure in creating the music that he did brought out Marsalis' versatile talent.

Other favorites included the 1940s "Lady of the Lavender Mist," the 1945 "Perfume Suite," written at a time when perfume was believed to transform the personality of the wearer, and "The Clothed Woman," a mix of ragtime, classical and impressionistic music. "Braggin' in Brass" and the "Peer Gynthe Suite" also fared well.

Herlin Riley also performed a varied and impressive drum solo in "Afro-Bossa." This solo incorporated militant and tribal beats, the bare hand and mallet interchanged and worked together on the drum to allow the diverse styles build on each other.

The show got off to a late start due to the unexpected misplacement of Marsalis' tuxedo. "I would like to apologize for the delay," Marsalis told the audience upon entering the stage clad in a suit. "As you can see I do not have my tuxedo. Plus my suit is not ironed, so I feel bad. . ." he chided.

Marsalis asserted that the music was "desinged to swing hard, and very, very hard" and would make up for the delay. Indeed it did, and my opinion, Marsalis looked just fine despite the missing tux. . . I mean, I did not know that a suit could maintain such dimensions.

And of course, the show was fantastic. That's the great thing about UMass, the performer-without-a-tux of universities. We don't need all of the luxurious formalities to dress up what's really important. As with our education, we realize that the quality and substance of the matter is what counts. Tux or not, we came to see a great show and that's what we got.

New comics museum opens in Northampton

By KIP MANLEY
Collegian Staff

If you walk to the back of Pulaski Park by the Academy of Music in Northampton, then cross the footbridge to the second storey of the Roundhouse, you'll find yourself at the entrance of the brand new Words and Pictures Museum of Fine Sequential Art.

You step through into a cave covered with primitive paintings. The cave opens up into a hall filled with an eclectic sampling of art from a variety of cultures; from Egyptian hieroglyphics to 19th century editorial cartoons, from Greek vases to medieval paintings, from Francisco Goya to the Yellow Submarine. All of them using words and pictures to tell stories. All of them comics.

Only the third museum of its type in the nation, Words and Pictures is the brainchild of Kevin Eastman, who, with Peter Laird, created the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles in 1984. Eastman sees the museum as an opportunity to repay the comics medium for the phenomenal success it has given him, to "help the rest of the world understand and respect the art form I have loved all my life." The Words and Pictures Museum certainly has the potential to do just that.

The historical introduction leads, via a graffiti- covered subway tunnel that serves as a neat bracket to the cave, into the museum's main exhibit halls. There are two, one following the curve of the Roundhouse, the other up one flight in the conical attic, beneath the central skylight. Though they are cramped, the space is used to its maximum effect.

The first gallery exhibits the original art for two complete comics — Michael Ploog's The Life and Adventures of Santa Claus and issue 16 of Jack Kirby's Kamandi: Last Boy on Earth. The art is framed and hung on the gallery walls in sequence, from first to last, so that you can go down the wall and read the entire story.

The second gallery, upstairs, displays pages by Paul Mavrides, John Severin, Gilbert Shelton and two more complete comics — the first issue of Bill Sienkiewicz and Frank Miller's Elektra: Assassin. It also contains one of Mark Martin's Green-Grey Sponge-Suit Sushi Turtles comics, his parody of the cultural phenomenon that made all of this possible. It was odd to look up from his work to see life-sized models of the targets dangling from the Roundhouse's rafters.

The museum sports a number of other attractions in addition to its exhibit halls. There is a life-sized mock-up of a typical artist's studio, "mucked-up" and made authentic by local comics artists who added their own personal touches. It is presented on its side, as if you were looking down on it from above, and it certainly rewards close examination.

And, by the inevitable gift shop (where you can buy copies of some of the comics you've just seen exhibited as well as many others), there is a space called the Newsstand, where many copies of current comics are available to browse, and where you can draw your own comics on a chalkboard, or put together comic strips that have been jumbled by a computer. Over it all is an impressive mural by Paul Mavrides paying homage to the heroes of comics through the ages.

The Words and Pictures Museum definitely has the potential to become a landmark in the history of comics, though opening night is too soon to tell if this potential will be realized. One glaring omission is that, of all the artists listed in the museum's brochure, only one is a woman. Such an oversight is inexcusable today.

Nonetheless, the museum is well worth your while, especially over time, as it will constantly be altering its exhibits, drawing from Eastman's own private collection of over 7,000 pieces of comics art from around the world. Seeing the art in this new context is fascinating, and will give you a whole new view of comics.

Sarafina! is a musical wonder; Feed is political fun

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Sarafina! — I'm not as quick to dismiss this drama/musical as simply "Fame-goes-to-Soweto." With just the right amount of musical forays — not every line is a cue for a dance number — Sarafina! combines a potent subject with great songs for a small wonder of a film.

Sarafina! tells the story of the 1976 student uprising in Soweto, a Black township in South Africa. It is told through the eyes of a teenager named Sarafina (played with vigor and strength by newcomer Leleti Khumalo, who originated the role on stage) who witnesses and is in the center of the students who were beaten, tortured, killed and kidnapped for their political beliefs. Interspersed with this simple yet powerful melodrama are well-played musical numbers that punctuate the tale.

Whoopi Goldberg is given top billing in a role that can only be described as the Uplifting and Inspiring Teacher/Role Model. Khumalo outshines Golberg in just about every scene.

Khumalo's voice is clear and resonant, and the songs are uplifting without being sappy — there's a great sung version of the "Our Father" prayer that never was performed like this. The final number, "Freedom is Coming" is well-done, although the ending does come a little too full circle. The musical part of this film wins out in the end.

This film was one of the first to be allowed to film in South Africa and these squalid backdrops, coupled with swirling and lofty direction make this much more than an excuse to burst into song. Sarafina! is playing through Thursday at Mountain Farms Theatres. Grade: B+

Feed — I watched this funny and telling presidential documentary after viewing the Sunday debate — and it left me with the feeling I had missed the best parts: before and after the cameras rolled. Feed, directed by Kevin Rafferty and James Ridgeway with some footage by Brian Springer, concerns itself with the stuff we never got to see in the New Hampshire primary races.

Most of the film are the seemingly endless primary candidates waiting to go on the air, or fed to the networks. The funniest bits include Jerry Brown snorting nasal spray and Bill Clinton coughing up what seemed to be an amazing amount of phlegm.

The rest of Feed gives us a peek at behind the scenes of the various campaigns. There's Hillary Clinton thanking a homeless man for his support, Arnold Schwarzenegger calling the Democratic candidates 'girlie-boys,' and what can only be deemed very_scary, Pat Buchanan supporters chanting "dump the liberal Bush."

Speaking of Mr. Hit—, I mean Buchanan, his sudden change of heart concerning Bush looks even more hollow after seeing Feed, indeed all of the candidates trip over themselves for votes. Some things never change.

There's fretting about makeup, fidgeting with ties and a funny moment where a voter asks then front-runner Paul Tsongas if he knows how much a gallon of milk costs. There's also an extended look at the whole Gennifer Flowers scandal with the press asking such questions as "Did Bill wear a condom?"

These moments give us a look at the human (read: idiot) side of our candidates in our image-intentive age. Feed will no doubt change your view of the talking heads for elections to come. Grade: A-

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You draw extra close to a co-worker today, even become secret pals. Be a confidant for children, too; they have a lot to share. See the world from their eyes.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): It is difficult to tell where a relationship is going; emotions sway to and fro. Financially, you would be wise to maintain the status quo. Stay upbeat when around a loved one.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Your friendships are particularly rewarding now. A dream may be fulfilled if you finalize your plans. A quiet evening at home will suit you to a T. Avoid dwelling on missed opportunities.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Your social instincts are excellent and can serve as a reliable guide — you need not be wedded to tradition. The emphasis now is on sensitivity and long-range planning.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): You need to keep your eyes open when making purchases today. Count your change and be certain to get your money's worth. See people as they really are, not as you wish they were.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Someone may be trying to put the "squeeze" on you. Take time to re-examine work procedures and organizational duties. An older person plays a key role in your career.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Diversify and stress your versatility. Graciously accept the help of an older or more experienced person who wants you to succeed.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Give stubbornness or greed a knock-out punch. Make flexibility your watchword. As business picks up, your finances improve. A letter breathes new life into your plans.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Get busy with the phone calls and errands that will make your plans fall into place. Be sure romantic partner gets special treatment. Private, revealing conversations generate powerfully good vibes.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A promise may not be kept. This could put you in a difficult situation. If you have grown children, it might be better to write than phone them today. Learn more about real estate.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Do not give up hope regarding a big project. You receive a lot of support in this and must be grateful for help. A cleanup crusade is back in the spotlight.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A conference may point out the fact that you could make more money elsewhere. Review your options. Now is an excellent time to make overdue changes.

October 13, 1992

To the Campus Community:

It is clear that the University has fallen short of its desire to pursue a multicultural mission. We nonetheless remain firm in our commitment to move purposefully in that direction.

Nothing matters more to this campus than the physical safety and security from harassment of its members. In the last several weeks, we have seen incidents of telephone harassment, racially biased and other hate graffiti, and assault. This disturbing behavior has no place on our campus. We will not tolerate violent or harassing acts of racism, sexism, anti-Semitism, homophobia, and other forms of oppression. We are taking action through the courts and through the discipline system to punish persons identified as responsible for such acts, as well as those inciting others to such acts. We have already initiated disciplinary action against University students who have been identified as hosting the non-student perpetrators of these violent and harassing acts.

In addition, security in the residential areas has been increased. Effective this past Friday evening, Public Safety and Residence Hall security are working together to provide more frequent foot patrols and tighter building security. We need to do everything we can to ensure all members of this community a safe and hospitable environment.

The recent events are examples of racism within the University that will only be reduced when all areas – administration, faculty, staff and students – make a commitment to substantive changes. No one can be exempt from being a part of the solution on both a personal and professional level. Anyone who is not a part of the solution is fundamentally a part of the problem and has no place in our community.

The administration is committed to systematic change and recognizes that only this level of intervention can minimize the recurrence of this unacceptable behavior. At an open meeting on Friday, October 9, Chancellor O'Brien promised to report to the campus by Friday, October 16, specific steps to be taken. The steps include both improved security and broader policy questions. In addition to the open meeting called by the Chancellor on Friday, Michael Hooker, President of the University, will be meeting today with students, staff and faculty to discuss concerns about racism.

The areas to be evaluated include:

- adequacy of the escort service
- role of RA's in enforcing the alcohol policy and alternatives for effective enforcement
- adequacy and even-handedness of residence hall security systems
- training in social issues for public safety personnel, other staff and faculty
- protocols for responding to victims of violence or harassment
- protocols for responding to incidents of graffiti and telephone harassment
- communication of administration action to the entire community
- accessibility of the upper administration
- support systems for students

We feel it is important to keep the campus informed on these important matters of serious concern to all of us. We will provide an update when information about specific steps is available on Friday.

Wake Forest, once a perennial doormat, is the fifth ACC team with legitimate high hopes. This is because junior forward/leviathon Rodney Rogers is back and absolutely ready to take off this year. The return of sophomore point guard Randolph Childress, who missed all of the 1991-92 season with a leg injury, should be a big lift for the Demon Deacons.

ALL ACC 1st Team: Center: Montross (NC), Power Forward: Rogers (WF), Small Forward: G.Hill (Duke), Point Guard: Hurley (Duke), Shooting Guard: Sam Cassell (FSU).

Dunce of the Week: This award goes to my good-hearted neighbor John Luviano. You see, John spent about an hour of his precious time last week in my room losing an argument about which season was tougher, the NHL or the NFL. John must have felt like he got blindsided by Reggie White after he left our room. The NFL season dwarfs the NHL season, especially physically. That is the bottom linem, John, you dunce.

Obscure fact of the week: Spurs center David Robinson, despite being injured, blocked 305 shots last year. As a team the Charlotte Hornets blocked 309!

"UMass played us tough defensively," Reifer said. "They are physical, but not dirty. They are definitely the best team we've faced this year. They're a quality, classy team."

Daniels said, "This was such a close, hard fought game. Just a great game. UMass is the best we've seen and beating them is a great feeling."

Minutemen run down Rams for 3rd win

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

KINGSTON, R.I. — Defense had been the story for the first three games of the University of Massachusetts football season, but Saturday it was the offense that impressed as the Minutemen romped all over the University of Rhode Island, 32-7, in front of 6,141 at Meade Stadium.

The UMass running game was huge. They racked up 345 yards on 65 carries (RI only had 73) and produced four touchdowns. Overall, they had 465 total yds. on offense, as opposed to a measly 210 yds. for Rhody. The UMass defense has to be given credit for stonewalling the No. 1 ranked offense in the Yankee Conference like this and for forcing four turnovers that resulted in 18 points.

"This is a big win for us because now we're 3-1 going into homecoming," said head coach Mike Hodges. "We made a lot of mistakes in the first half, but in the second half we played football like it should be played.

"Our goals are set now — this team's focus is on winning."

In the first quarter, both squads had numerous chances to score but it wasn't until 14:35 of the second quarter (following a Matt Rajotte interception) that UMass got on the board. On his own six yard line, tailback John Johnson took his third carry since returning to the lineup (turf-toe injury) around right tackle for a 7-0 lead.

URI struck next at 3:40 of the second, when QB Dave Nordstrom marched the Rams from midfield to their own seven yard line. From there, Nordstrom hit All-American tight-end Darren Rizzi for a touchdown and a 7-7 game. Fortunately for the Minutemen, Rizzi's touchdown dance was the last they would see all day.

On their next possession, UMass took the ball at their own 44 with 3:36 left in the half and methodically picked through the Ram defense thanks to some solid passing from Andrew McNeilly, who was named YanCon rookie of the week, and great pass receiving from tight end Steve Dembrowski (6-87 yds.). The drive culminated in a one-yard run, with 26 seconds left, courtesy of tailback Rene Ingoglia (16-78 yds.).

"The offensive line really gave Andy time to throw," said Dembrowski. "Luckily, we were able to connect on a few passes to set up the touchdown runs."

It was fullback Mike George who had the biggest day for the Minutemen, though, as he rushed for a career high 128 yards on 17 carries (with one TD) and 27 yards receiving on three receptions. In the third quarter, George took a handoff, ran right, and busted through a hole that looked like it had been parted by Moses for a 28 yard TD. On the point after, snapper Jon Kromenhoek took a pass from Tom Fasano for his second two point conversion in two games. Massachusetts 22, Rhode Island 7.

"The offensive line was great today," said a modest George. "They make it possible for me to have a day like this."

On the next play from scrimmage, cornerback Don Caparotti stepped in front of a Nordstrom pass and scampered to the RI 47. Eight plays later, a 33-yard Jim "I don't miss any PAT's" Maguire field goal put Hodges' troops up 25-7. In the fourth quarter, Johnson (9-46yds., 2 TD's) rounded out the scoring for UMass as he vaulted over the top of the offensive line, barely breaking the plane of the goaline for the final points of the game.

"This team always tries to play hard for 60 minutes," said Dembrowski. "Today, we did just that and managed to get the win."

College hoops already? It's preview time

With Midnight Madness nearly two weeks away, I think it is time to start my year-long college hoop notebook. Right now it is time for conference previews.

The first conference slated for preview is the Atlantic Coast Conference, well here it goes:

Jeff
CROFTS

Duke, despite losing the big play of co-captain starters Christian Laettner and Brian Davis will still be considered ACC favorite. Watch for the smooth play of Grant Hill to become explosive this year. The backcourt of Bobby Hurley and Thomas Hill is unmatched. If Cherokee Parks develops into a tough center, then make the Duke reservations for New Orleans.

North Carolina heavily relied on Hubert Davis for his outside shooting last year. Now that Davis is gone, Dean Smith is going to have to find someone to bomb away to take some of the pressure off of forward George Lynch and center Eric Montross.

Florida State, a team which UMass will visit early this year, is very quickly getting its' hoop program on line with its' football squad as a perennial power. The Seminoles will miss not having Charlie Ward (who'll be QBing for Bobby Bowden) early on, but the fact that all four of the other FSU starters return will lesson that blow.

Georgia Tech is another team which brings back experience. Despite losing shooting guard Jon Barry and center Matt Gieger, Bobby Cremins has himself a tough team led by the monster forward tandem of Malcom Mackey and James Forrest. Also, Sprinfield's Travis Best, with a years' experience under his belt, is only going to improve as a floor general.

Field hockey continues to roll

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Despite a one-week layoff, the University of Massachusetts field hockey team came out with the same intensity it has shown all year, wearing down conference rival St. Joseph's at home Saturday, 3-0.

The Minutewomen (11-1) reverted to their familiar strategy, which was to score early and shut down the opponents with tough defense. Led by two goals by forward Ainslee Press, the Minutewomen broke their one-game losing streak and clinched the first seed in the Atlantic 10 Championships, held in November.

The Hawks were stifled, getting only six shots on net to UMass' 29. The Minutewomen had 21 penalty corners, one of their highest totals this season, while holding St. Joseph's to four.

UMass got on the board less than five minutes into the game when forward Jenn Salisbury took a pass from Tara Jelley and beat Hawk goaltender Lisa Fasano for the 1-0 lead. Ainslee Press increased her scoring lead for UMass with her first of two goals at 15:19 of the first half, on an assist by Colleen Duffy.

In a 2-0 hole at halftime, the Hawks were out of the game. Adding a second half exclamation point, Press scored her second goal on a penalty stroke after midfielder Joy Blenis' penalty corner slapshot was saved illegally by St. Joseph's.

On the stroke, Press wristed the ball in the upper left hand corner of the cage, far away from Fasano. The goal gave UMass the 3-0 final.

"They showed us a little different style," Blenis said. "They seemed to come in clumps which gave us a little bit of trouble, but we got our passing game going in the first half and stuck with our game plan."

UMass goalie Philippa Scott had her normal routine day, saving four shots and not allowing any goals. Scott yielded to backup Tina Rusiecki with 14 minutes left, and head coach Pam Hixon cleared the bench with eight and a half minutes left.

Hixon downplayed the significance of the A-10s number one seed, which assures UMass a game against either St. Joseph's, Rhode Island, or Rutgers, whoever becomes the number four seed.

Women's streak halted

Hartford upends Minutwomen, 2-0

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's soccer team had its eleven game winning streak halted on Saturday by the University of Hartford.

The Hawks (11-1) received goals from Jessica Reifer and Michele Thornsbury to take the victory, 2-0. The game featured end to end action and some great saves by goalkeepers Skye Eddy (UMass) and Karen Romero (Hartford).

"Anytime you can beat a team as good as UMass you have to be happy, and I am," Hartford coach Austin Daniels said. "We were able to capitalize on our chances and that decided it."

Hartford, ranked No. 5 nationally, broke the scoreless tie in the 66th minute. From the left flank, Thornsbury was able to cross the ball to the goal mouth where Reifer headed it back to the left corner, past Eddy.

"[Thornsbury] took it down the side and made a great cross," Reifer said. "I was just able to tuck in."

One minute later, the Hawks struck again. Thornsbury collected a Rose Daley pass near midfield. The UMass defense never picked Thornsbury up allowing her to drive in alone on Eddy. She was able to place her shot in to the right corner.

"We played great on offense but we had some mental lapses on defense and that is what beat us," Hellmuth said.

Massachusetts, ranked No. 8 nationally, played one of their finer offensive games but were spoiled by some bad luck and a timely Hartford defense.

"We could have won 4-2 today," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "We just did not finish our chances."

Massachusetts would have had at least three goals if the crossbar was nine feet high instead of eight. Kim Eynard, Holly Hellmuth and Rachel LeDuc all clanked shots off the iron.

Despite the two goals, UMass played well defensively against a lethal Hawk attack. High scoring Hawk forwards Kim LeMere, shadowed by Hellmuth and Rose Daley, covered by Heidi Kocher were shutout of the scoring column for the first time this season. The two had combined

Minutemen fall then meet controversy

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

"It seems like we went all the way for nothing."

With that quote, defensemen Todd Kylish probably summed up how the whole University of Massachusetts men's soccer team felt about their weekend.

On Sunday, after dropping the opener of their two-game road trip to West Virginia 2-0 in a hard fought overtime battle, the Minutemen were beating the George Washington Colonels 2-1 with about 30 minutes to play when the skies opened up and forced the teams to take cover.

Usually, teams wait an hour for the rain to cease before cancelling or postponing the game. However, that was not the case in Washington D.C. Instead of waiting the customary hour, the referees called the game after about 20 minutes on the behalf of GW, and now the Minutemen are left wondering what happened.

Of the controversy, Kylish didn't know what to think.

"I've never been a part of anything like it, [GW] just left it [the field], it was ridiculous," he said. "[UMass] definitely got the bad end of the stick."

Before the sky opened up, the Minutemen had just scored to swing the momentum in their favor. With the score tied at one, Josh Pittman was able to beat Colonial goalie Rob Christian to give UMass the 2-1 lead.

In the first half it was the Minutemen who got on the board first when Randy Jacobs converted a Justin Edelman pass into a score. George Washington would gain some momentum with a tying goal before Pittman scored to put UMass back on track.

Now, all that is moot however, until the weather controversy clears up. UMass is protesting the decision to call the game.

"I really don't know how to react to what happened," Pittman said. "I do know that we are protesting the stoppage of the game."

Hooker hears concerns of UM community

By MARTIN F. JONES
Collegian Staff

Students met with University of Massachusetts President Michael Hooker, Chancellor Richard O'Brien and other top University officials at the Malcolm X Center to address the concerns of students of color at the University.

Hooker, who serves as the president of the five-campus University system, was at UMass today for a Board of Trustees meeting.

Prior to the meeting that evening, Hooker also met with a number of other groups in the Campus Center. These included concerned students, Afro-American Studies professors and minority staff and administrators and the students who had occupied Memorial Hall to protest the celebration of the Columbus Day.

UMass President Michael Hooker.

Hooker was joined by Chancellor Richard O'Brien and trustees Heriberto Flores, Oeretta McNeil and Student Trustee Kevin Newnan during the two-hour meeting at the Malcolm X Center.

Hooker opened by explaining his accountability as the top official in the UMass system.

"I'm the person whose feet you should hold to the fire," Hooker said.

Hooker also said his duty was to provide "moral leadership" for the university.

O'Brien presented a new proposal to hire 20 new police officers and stated stated his intent to work with students in recruiting them.

He also announced an immediate commitment of between $200,000 to $250,000 to institute a program similar to the Upward Bound program, a minority college recruitment program which lost its funding last semester. In addition, the Chancellor promised that a review of the circumstances which led to the program being cut would be conducted by an outside party.

Freshman Penny Cameron addressed her concern for her personal safety on campus following the recent racial attacks that have occurred at the University.

"I don't feel that I can stay at this school under these conditions," she said.

Senior Alex Nguyen, who last year spearheaded a campaign to increase the University's committment to a multicultural campus, advocated for a "real committment to to increasing minority recruitment."

Nguyen called for the University to set a goal of 30 percent minority enrollment.

President Hooker agreed with Nguyen, calling his goal, "realisitic."

Al Lizana, vice president of the Black Student Union, presented a list of seven demands compiled by students which include the goals of 30 percent minority representation at all levels of the University, funding the cost of the Upward Bound program and restoring full litigation power to the Legal Services Center.

Racial incidents on rise after Washington assault

By MICHAEL DAY
Collegian Staff

Incidents of racial harassment and graffiti have increased on campus in the wake of an attack on a Black resident assistant in Washington residence hall two weeks ago, according to University police and administrators.

Film studies major Obed Alce, a student from Haiti, discovered a racial slur written on the message pad next to his door Monday morning. When he confronted the individuals he saw running away from the door, he said they denied his accusations.

Police investigated and eventually questioned a non-student from central Massachusetts, whom they said they believed was involved in the incident. Police were scheduled to speak to the District Attorney's office on Tuesday to discuss possible criminal charges.

The case was then referred to the Dean of Students Office to decide how to discipline the host student. Alce told the Springfield Union-News yesterday, "This is outrageous. . . This is the third weekend in a row something like this has happened."

Dean of Students Jo-Ann T. Vanin could not be reached for comment.

Over the long weekend, a dramatic increase in racial graffiti and racially related physical attacks were reported to University police, with the majority of the graffiti being discovered in Washington Residence Hall, police said.

Black students rallied to protest what was perceived as a slow investigation and disciplining of the host student in the Washington beating by the Candidates square off

Angry Quayle questions Gore's record

By ROBERT NAYLOR JR.
Associated Press

ATLANTA — Democratic vice presidential candidate Al Gore and Vice President Dan Quayle argued over leadership and the economy Monday night in a biting debate of campaign understudies spiced by James Stockdale's passionate denunciation of the political gridlock in Washington.

President Bush and Quayle were like "deer caught in the headlights" when the recession struck, Gore charged, paralyzed and unable to respond. He pledged that Democratic presidential candidate Bill Clinton "stands for change."

Quayle quickly retorted that Clinton and Gore would make matters much worse. "Jobs will be lost," he said, adding that Clinton would raise taxes and spending, as well. His was a finger-waving, 'angry demeanor' from the outset, attacking Clinton in vigorous remarks over and over again.

Stockdale exploded at one point after Quayle and Gore argued, saying, "I think America is seeing right now the reason this nation is in gridlock." He said Ross Perot was the man to fix things in Washington.

Stockdale stressed his non-politician's status from the outset.

"Don't expect me to use the language of the Washington insider," he said. "The centerpiece of my life was the Vietnam War."

He went on to describe leading the first bombing run over North Vietnam, being shot down and held as prisoner of war for seven years.

"Mr. Vice President — Dan, if I may," Gore said. "If you don't try to compare George Bush to Harry Truman, I won't try to compare you to Jack Kennedy." It was a reference to 1988 vice presidential candidate Lloyd Bensten's debate salvo: "Senator, you're no Jack Kennedy."

Quayle derisively noted that it hadn't taken Gore long to bring up the subject of that debate.

Quayle attacked Clinton for indecision in advance of the Persian Gulf War. "You can't have it both ways. You've got to make a decision," he said.

The vice president pressed Gore several times to explain why Clinton was qualified for the White House, and at one point, the two men interrupted each other repeatedly.

Both seemed tense, and with Republican glaring angrily at Democrat, Stockdale broke in and won audience applause.

"I think America is seeing right now why this nation is in gridlock," he said. "We've got a man who knows how to fix it, and I'm working for it," he said, leaning forward on his podium and clutching his folded glasses in his right hand.

The three men squared off in an auditorium at Georgia Tech.

The political imperative was clear for each of the three running mates: to boost the fortunes of the man at the top of the ticket in a race that has exactly three weeks left to run and shows Clinton with a double-digit lead in the polls.

UM president promises strong stand on racism

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts President Michael Hooker pledged the University will take more aggressive steps to create a multiracial campus, while a University faculty member said Hooker's credibility level with minority students was "basically zero."

Hooker spoke yesterday before over 60 students, faculty and administrators in the Campus Center to address concerns rising in the wake of several racial incidents on campus in the past two weeks.

Hooker said racial harmony could not be accomplished through any one program, but through many different programs. Students and faculty questioned and criticized existing policies that have been implemented in the past and have not worked.

Afro-American Studies Professor John Bracey said he believes that nothing Hooker proposed was concrete enough.

"The mechanisms are outdated — we tried warning the administration and the administration simply ignored us," Bracey said.

Bracey also criticized the president for using what he called the rhetoric that has been a tradition with UMass administrators.

"Your credibility level is basically zero. Minority students have lost confidence in the administration," Bracey said.

Hooker responded to Bracey's charge

The list also included the creation of a ALANA affairs program which would allocate minority representatives 50 percent voting power on various university-wide committees and the hiring of more minority recruiters responsible for awarding minority scholarships, 40 percent of which will be allocated for low-income women of color.

The final two demands involved the restuctering of the University Minority Graduate fellowship scholarship to include 50 percent minority representation and the replacement on the academic calendar of the Columbus Day holiday with a university-sponsored teach-in.

President Hooker described the demands as "thoroughly reasonable."

University administrators agreed to follow up with the concerns and demands within two weeks.

Death toll climbs to 400 in Egyptian earthquake

By ZINA HEMADY
Associated Press

CAIRO, Egypt — Egypt's earthquake death toll climbed past 400 Tuesday, and officials broadcast appeals for calm among Egyptians terrified of another temblor. Many prepared for a second night under the stars.

Authorities blamed the high death toll partly on panic stampedes but mainly on the many weak, old or poorly constructed buildings in the Cairo area.

Countries pledged millions in aid.

A security official told Cairo Television the search for survivors was called off Tuesday at all the scores of collapsed buildings in the capital area except for one: a 14-story apartment complex in the affluent suburb Heliopolis.

Dozens of people were believed to be buried in the rubble. Relief workers were using their bare hands to sift through dust and stones, and drills to cut through steel construction rods. Many workers said they had little hope of finding anyone alive.

Police Maj. Gen. Nadir Noman, director of civil defense, said 11 bodies were pulled form the debris by early afternoon. As many as 15 people were found alive in the debris shortly after the quake.

Witnesses reported two people died Tuesday as three quake-weakened structures collapsed in the poor Sayeda Zeinab neighborhood.

Life was generally back to normal elsewhere.

Hundreds of aftershocks didn't help. Almost all were too feeble to be felt but not to be imagined: "Now I know what hell is like," said Nadia Ezzeddin, a housewife in Cairo's residential Zamalek Island.

In hopes of calming the public, the offical Cairo Radio and Television broadcast a statement by Subhi Freiha, deputy director of the government's Helwan Observatory.

"All the observatory's recordings indicate that the situation is stable," Freiha said. "There is no need to worry."

On TV, Information Minister Safwat el-Sherif answered a reporter's question about the rumor of another strong quake by chastising Egyptians to watch their own media instead of believing the foreign press.

Speaker condemns pornography

Says both men and women become dehumanized

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

The $10-12 billion per year pornography industry leads to violence against women by reducing them to sexual objects, according to a Curry College professor of sociology.

Gail Dines, speaking before a capacity crowd in the Campus Center Auditorium, said all images of pornography are dehumanizing to women and men.

"Women are not masturbation facilitators and deserve to be treated with dignity and respect," Dines said.

"Pornography is insulting to men because it makes people think that all men want is [sex]," said Dines in a lecture sponsored by the Distinguished Visitor's Program. She said men should not collaborate with what she called the "racist white male pornographers" and should denounce pornography.

According to Dines, violence is used in pornography because "straight" pornography is boring for men and does not arouse them enough. "The violence is always the pain of the woman and it is sold as sex," Dines said.

She explained a new trend in pornography where men drag a woman off the street, film her while she is being raped and then sell the film to the pornography market. "Men like rape and want to see the fear a woman experiences in an actual rape," said Dines.

Dines said if the woman who was raped finds the film and destroys it, she is violating her rapist's First Amendment rights.

"It is ludicrous to think people are not affected by pornography," Dines said.

"Softcore pornography tells the man he owns women and hardcore pornography tells the man he can do whatever he wants to women," said Dines. One pornographic magazine explained how to tie the bondage knots, how to beat a woman so the marks weren't visible and proceeded to tell the men to insert a vacuum cleaner into the vagina and turn it on, she said.

"Men are told that women enjoy this behavior and the pornographers know the more they push this violent behavior at men, the more men that believe it," said Dines.

Dines said images of violence against women are filtering down into mainstream magazines such as Vogue and Cosmopolitan. "The photographers who are taking pictures for the pornographic magazines are also used by fashion magazines," Dines said.

She cited one advertisement for perfume in which a woman was lying down with her head thrown back while a man slid an ice cube down her neck toward her breasts. "By baring her neck this woman is saying she gives up. The ice symbolizes a razor blade cutting into her throat," said Dines.

Dines said men never appear in advertisements with their heads thrown back. "It isn't sexy for men to be

Students address racial issues

By RACHAEL DONNELLY and ZACK EXLEY
Collegian Correspondents

Approximately 35 students met yesterday afternoon at the University of Massachusetts, in the Campus Center, to discuss strategies to combat racism.

In addition to discussing the racial attack at Washington Tower and the student takeover of Memorial Hall, students exchanged information concerning other racial assaults that happened over the weekend.

"More attacks have happened over the weekend, and why is it that the University is sitting on this information? It's saving its reputation at the expense of students of color," said Dan Ball, a sophomore chemistry major.

As part of their goal of facilitating information flow between different communities on campus, students thought of possible ways to quickly end campus violence. Students discussed ways of changing the attitudes among the White population that they believe lead to racial violence.

This meeting was one in a series scheduled since the racial attack on Oct. 3 at Washington Tower. These separate efforts will combine to join Allied Students Against Prejudice (ASAP), which met for the first time last week.

Donna Barosa, a resident director from Southwest, spoke about community meetings that will take place on every floor at Washington Tower to diffuse tensions.

Students made an effort to widen the focus of discussion to encompass all residential areas and address the needs of off campus students, members said.

The next meeting of the group will take place Thursday at 7:30 in the Campus Center.

"So many separate groups of students have gotten together to do something about the 'White problem' at this University. Now it looks like they're all coming together," said senior social thought and political economy major Emily Boss.

UM workers reclaim spot in building

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Staff

University employees who were displaced by the student takeover of the top floor of Memorial Hall last Tuesday took action yesterday by removing the belongings of the protestors to the building's first floor.

Approximately 30 University Telefund employees initiated a peaceful re-entry into the occupied building, according to University spokesperson Karin Sherbin. Telefund is a fundraising group, consisting of about 40 employees that contact University alumni and parents.

Meanwhile, the seven students who occupied Memorial Hall since last Tuesday left the building yesterday afternoon to meet with University President Michael Hooker.

The employees issued a statement to all administrative departments regarding their action resulting from the occupation by University students protesting Columbus Day.

Since the takeover of the Memorial Hall, employees had tried to work in the offices and at home. Because telephones on the second floor had been disconnected by the protesters, fundraising efforts have not been optimal, according to John Raimo, associate vice chancellor for University relations and development.

"The employees on their own behalf told occupiers they needed to return to work and they were welcomed to move to the downstairs meeting lounge," Sherbin said.

The protestors refused and employees proceeded to remove personal and business-related items needed to continue their work. The employees are cleaning up and moving forward with their work as protestors hovered over them, Sherbin said.

Raimo, responding to the concerns of employees, met with them at 8 a.m. yesterday.

"It's unfortunate. This has been an ironic situation from the beginning. [Telefund] is one of the main focuses of development is to raise money for scholarships for students and programs," Raimo said.

The loss of an "incalculable" amount of money will directly impact students and the University, according to Raimo. This compelled employees to take action, Raimo said. Telefund raised about $4 million last year for the University.

"We agreed as a collective, without any administrative influence, to reclaim the space to continue the work at hand," Raimo said. "Our point of view was that we needed to get back to work for the students and that yesterday was not a holiday for the employees.

"We're trying not to judge actions taken by protestors, but we must be allowed to continue our work to raise money. It's a question of rights and we

Racial healing sought

Speakers stress personal commitment

By JOE O'CONNOR
Collegian Staff

A nation-wide group established to raise awareness concerning issues of racism held its first meeting at UMass last week at a time when the University faces serious racial division.

Len Smith, the president and owner of an international organizing and management consulting agency, and Fleet Bank of Springfield Vice President Neil McBride were the featured speakers at the Institute for the Healing of Racism's meeting last Thursday in the Campus Center.

"Making a personal committment to heal racism" was the topic of discussion headed by the two guest speakers.

"Racism is the most powerful, persistant obstacle to attaining a peaceful society," McBride said.

According to Smith, combatting racism means "to look inside ourselves, and to know what it means to be racist. This is the basis of the Institute's beliefs — that fighting racism begins with the individual, and starts from the heart."

McBride outlined a three-point plan for healing racism, adding that "racism is in our face increasingly every day."

According to McBride, the first point is to work personally "to weed out traces of racism within ourselves." This is the start of the healing process the Institute wants, McBride said.

The second point is to acknowledge and be committed to social and racial justice, which may be different from legal justice, according to the Institute's mission statement.

"Regardless of how many laws and statutes are enacted, racism will continue to exist," the statement said. "Only through addressing racism in our own hearts can people of all races generate a compelling power to eradicate this pernicious disease."

In his final point, McBride asked all participants to be aware of their actions and get "feedback" from friends and relatives, if possible. This, he said, reflects your concern for the problem.

SGA seeks to 'rock the vote'

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

With the upcoming presidential election, a student organization is using the Collegian to encourage potential absentee ballot voters.

Through putting in a series of half-page voting ads for a week across from the comics page in the Collegian, the Student Government Association has made the absentee ballot process more accessible to students.

Students who are registered in their hometown can fill out the coupon in the ad and mail it to their town clerk. Their town clerk should then mail them back an absentee ballot. The deadline to apply for an absentee ballot is 12 p.m. on Nov. 2.

"If students are registered at home and don't vote, it does not do any good," said SGA President Jen Wood. "I think the process [to register for an absentee ballot] is intimidating to a lot of students."

"Students can call their folks or city or town clerks back home to get the correct address to mail off the request forms."

Although many groups have run voter registration drives on campus, they found many students who wanted to keep their hometown voter registration, according to Wood.

To attract the students' attention, the SGA decided to have a media-driven campaign, because they found students to be more media conscious than other groups.

This year more people are registering to vote, according to a recent Boston Globe article.

According to the results from the recent voter registration drive on campus, about 1,800 students are registered to vote on campus.

In addition to the voting drives on campus, some town officials are conducting door-to-door voting registrations off-campus.

One Amherst town official said about 800 students, requesting for absentee ballots, have written to the Amherst town clerk. She added these requests are coming in daily.

Wood added that students can use these forms again for other elections by writing in the date of the election, they would like to vote in.

"In the past we have never had a chance to do this," Wood said. "Students have to take the initiative, but they will find that requesting and voting is not a complicated process."

"It simply requires following through in a timely manner," Wood said.

The election is Nov. 3.

shown as vulnerable and powerless," Dines said.

According to Dines, pornography depicts Black men as sexual beasts and Black women as prostitutes.

"There is a race war in pornography against Blacks," Dines said.

She said she believes Mike Tyson was guilty of rape but was convicted because he was Black. "It is time the Kennedy-Smiths go down along with the Mike Tysons," said Dines.

"Censorship is not the answer to this problem. Providing everybody with the same access to free speech that the rich have and giving everyone a chance to be heard is the answer," said Dines. She said she believes free speech isn't free when it costs $49,000 to run a full-page color advertisement in Cosmopolitan.

Revenge is not a solution

"An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, and we'll all be blind and toothless." — from "Fiddler on the Roof"

There is no doubt that racism exists — the events of these past weeks serve as painful proof. The immediate concern is how we can fight it. One way is through discussion and dialogue, which are essential if we are to educate those who still believe the stereotypes and hatreds of the past.

The alternative is to use threats and violence. That's a solution we don't need.

The community outrage over the racist attack on the RA of 17th floor Washington is evidence of how severely racism has damaged the fabric of the University. We have all been hurt; we are all victims.

But searching for someone on whom to pin the blame will not solve the problem. Justice must be served, but not by a mob mentality. There was no due process on the 8th floor of Washington Thursday night. Were the right people thrown out? If not, are they still in housing, planning further revenge? It's a vicious cycle that will only end when we pledge to end it unconditionally.

Taking over buildings, attacking the administration, and blaming individual students for a problem belonging to the entire community will contribute nothing to the fight against hatred and racism. If we as a university are going to live together — not just co-exist, because that's a copout — then we must do better than this.

"We need each other in order to be human," declared Archbishop Desmond Tutu in the Fine Arts Center, just last week. He's right.

We have an opportunity to create change—real change. Let's not waste the future for today's revenge.

Peace. It's the only answer.

Columbus anniversary a failure

The Columbus Day anniversary was a flop; due in part to the corrupt and bungling Columbus Quincentennary Jubilee Commission, now under investigation by the Justice Department. It was the multicultural gadflies however, who rained on everyone's parade with their omnipresent themes of gloom, despair and outrage.

The Collegian has yet to print a positive article on Columbus Day, an article that explains why this holiday is worth celebrating. This probably has less to do with their editorial policy than it has to do with the fact that the fashionably anti-European multiculturalists have succeeded in making everyone feel too guilty to embrace one of our nation's most important historical events.

Everybody knows that Columbus was self-serving and cruel. We are aware of the fact that the Spanish conquistadors were barbaric and merciless. This is not, however, what Columbus Day is about; instead, we commemorate this day as a turning point in history, a day that has enormously altered the direction which this world has taken, a day that leads to the widespread promulgation of Western notions of freedom, democracy and individualism.

People reflexively thumb their noses at this kind of thinking. Patriotism now equals Eurocentricism and pride in America is tantamount to racial and cultural insensitivity. If our western values are so abhorrent, why are non-western countries lining up to emulate our political and economic systems? Where do people fleeing their homelands want to come?

The multiculturalists are using Columbus Day as just another excuse to enlist more members in their campaign that rests on the juvenile platform that America is a dirty bastion of inequality and never-ending oppression. They use Columbus as a figurehead to impugn all that is white, male and European. They do not really care about the "indigenous peoples" displaced by the Spanish, the pure and noble, kind and gentle societies that existed here first (like the Aztecs?). No, Columbus Day is merely a high visibility medium to promote policies of ethnic division and sophomoric, anti-establishment claptrap.

We should celebrate Columbus Day. We should also give Native Americans their due — perhaps a holiday of their own to remember and honor their own cultures; but Columbus Day must not be allowed to deteriorate into some kind of anti-western charade. The indigenous tribes did not alter history, but neither did Leif Erikson. Columbus did; and now we live in a great nation, that despite its enormous military power, continues to adhere to notions of freedom and self-determination for the rest of the world.

The principles of our government were not founded on the brutal practices of Columbus and his followers. Our country is not the man who discovered it.

Been 'humphed' recently?

Lori
O'CONNOR

Generally, I've found patrons at health clubs an enthusiastic, amiable bunch. There's something about pounding one's joints into a pulpy mass to disco music or climbing mechanical stairs until dizzy that lends itself to elevated spirits, bright smiles and cordial small talk. At least, that had been my experience.

Then I purchased a trial membership at an obscure Boston based workout arena, and found myself in a zombie-inundated establishment straight out of Dante's infernal abyss. I should have remembered the universal equation: exorbitant fees equal no students. But when I noticed that I was by far the youngest client, I decided it was no problem. I tried not to be bothered by the bewildered stares and lack of acknowledgment to my questions. But when I noticed cheerful banter between the other stairmaster cadets and aerobics royalty, paranoia set in like a virus. After establishing that I hadn't grown a snout or a glossy coat with a hi-pro glow, I concluded it could only be one thing: my age.

I couldn't understand the problem. I did not snap watermelon Bubble Yum while shrieking Debbie Gibson lyrics in the shower, nor did I plaster the inside of my locker with lipstick smeared photos of the gang from "Beverly Hills 90210." Aside from owning a face that practically screams, "Card me! I'm in junior high!" my entire persona was one of the utmost maturity.

I kept to myself, lurking in the shadowy corners of workout central like a spandexed Gollum, speaking only when spoken to.

Then I met Mrs. Shower Shoes. "Do your parents belong here, dear?" she inquired one day.

I told her I was a student at UMass/Amherst visiting Boston.

"Is that so," she said disdainfully. "I've heard about your people. Humph!" I had only seen people "humphed" in grainy black and white movies from the '40s. I had never been on the receiving end of a "humph;" I wasn't sure how to respond. I tried to gain enlightenment by re-engaging Mrs. Shower Shoes in conversation; silence predominated.

This was the icing on the carob cluster, so to speak. I realized my uneasiness among the perspiration-soaked matrons was justified. This woman and her lycra-clad cohorts suffered from a serious case of "UMassism" — the belief that students from UMass at Amherst are a lazy, uninspired crew reliant upon fermented barley and hops for daily caloric intake. This is an offshoot of the more prevalent prejudice, "studentism," which assumes that within every innocent-looking college student there lurks the insane urge to rifle throught the coat pockets of society for laundry change.

Before this incident, I had never personally encountered these fascinating phenomena. I've heard isolated cases, but assumed the victims brought condemnation upon themselves through actions that were less than praiseworthy. Take the chap who shared his pizza with my windshield one night, after he had eaten it. Some among us who insist upon sounding their juvenile, inebriated yawp to all in proximity. Just ask anyone on the 17th floor of Washington tower.

As a White female, I've been fortunate to escape the diseased mindset of prejudice. I won't say that I now understand how it feels to be discriminated against; I do not. What happened was not a scandalous incident that should have sent me ranting and raving like Norma Rae, demanding a refund. I simply wish that the perverse actions of a small minority of miscreants didn't have to reflect upon the rest of the UMass community.

I entered that Lysol-reeking hovel unaware, and exited thinking I had stumbled off the set of "Gidget Meets the Stepford Wives." Arm yourself with knowledge before joining any establishment, or you too may find yourself grappling with the bloated self-importance of a painfully closed-minded Mrs. Shower Shoes and company.

Lori O'Connor is a UMass student.

Mr. Megaphone not an effective vehicle for promoting change

"That's right, just go to class... Hey, isn't it nice to be White! Young, male and White! You own the world, just walk on by to class!"

This voice, megaphone-amplified and projected out of Memorial Hall evoked a few personal responses. Following the takeover of Memorial Hall and continually interested in the changing significance of Columbus Day, I had stopped to listen. I agree! Lectures, workshops and discussion are vital in interpreting history and its mistakes. Thought and dialogue, action and response are the vehicles of change. But, as Kenneth Maisonet so coherently argued [Collegian, Oct. 8], I'm not so sure I can lump the last 500 years into a stew of genocide, villainy and oppression that is only now subsiding. And I'm not so sure Mr. Megaphone is an effective dialogic vehicle for change. We need discussion and interaction, not insults and barricades. Yes, Mr. Megaphone, I went on my way to class, but I do not wear a simple mask of white guilt that you can lash out at from a second story window. I am a thinking man with open eyes.

It is imperative to value the awesome responsibility of nonviolent protest and civil disobedience, a responsibility and power hard won. A. Philip Randolph, Martin Luther King, Jr., Pete Seeger and the thousands with them deserve a thoughtful and careful continuation.

Nguyen fails to recognize the work women do to empower themselves

Alexander Nguyen's article, "Implicit campus policy: legalized rape," [Collegian, Sept. 23] is plagued with problems, the most offensive being the graphic nature of the article. The descriptions used closely resemble pornography, are irresponsibly used, and generally ineffective. The article does not discuss individual male responsibility to stop rape and Mr. Nguyen fails to implicate himself; he is somehow removed from the "men" he criticizes. The focus of this piece is on the victimization of women and excludes women's resistance.

Nguyen takes issue with the University's policies concerning rape, including the lack of legal action and preventive work on campus. "It [the administration] focuses mostly on healing the aftermath of rape and it actively propagandizes the illusion of safety for women." There can be no question as to the lack of preventive work being done both at the University and in communities across the nation. I do, however, challenge and take issue with Mr. Nguyen's use of graphically descriptive scenes of sexual violence, written from the point of view of the rapist. These unnecessarily graphic scenes titillate men and were actually more destructive than helpful.

If Nguyen has a dedication to stopping violence against women, I urge him to reconsider whether or not the effects of using graphic descriptions of sexual violence are appropriate or useful. In a culture where 93 percent of all men consume pornography, and where Playboy and Hustler consistently outsell Newsweek and Time 20 to one, it becomes clear that men views rape as a form of entertainment. Men who read the article surely will recognize a sort of "how to" followed by statements such as "What are the chances that she will report it? Extremely low. This would humiliate her and her family. What are the consequences of raping her? Zero."

What Mr. Nguyen fails to realize is that his article is not that much different from an actual sexual assault, leaving invasive images and them moves on to take away viable options by minimizing the work of rape crisis centers and places of healing for survivors.

This article's graphic pornographic nature has left women saying, "I feel sick, and want to throw up." Several women I know have expressed that the images are invasive and others said that the descriptions sparked flashbacks, leaving them with feelings of humiliation and powerlessness. If the article was intended to be helpful to women, to help put an end to violence against women, then it was irresponsibly written and seems to have done more harm than good. It seems that the vivid descriptions of rape were more useful in "turning on" male readers.

In addition, the author seems to have forgotten that it is individual men raping women, not the administration's policies. Men are responsible for stopping all types of violence against women, including rape. No matter what policies the University implements, the fact is that men are raping one out of every three women. Who is to be held responsible for these outrages against women? According to the article it is the administration at UMass and not men as a whole.

Women fight back — physically, through the courts and by surviving, which is the greatest battle yet. Women are not just accepting rape as part of their roles as women. We are coming together, supporting one another and challenging both governmental policies and men individually and as a whole. As women we are reclaiming our lives and our right to live free from fear.

Where was The Band?

By DAVID SCOTT

Taj Mahal and Michelle Shocked
John M. Greene Hall, Smith College
October 10

When Michelle Shocked listed some of her "all time heroes and contemporaries" in a recent press release, four of the most prominent names were Taj Mahal, Uncle Tupelo, Levon Helm and Garth Hudson.

As witnessed by a crowd of 1,200 at John M. Greene Hall last Saturday night, Shocked's list may have been altered in the past week but her musical talent is unquestionably intact.

When Uncle Tupelo and The Band (Helm, Hudson and Rick Danko have formed a semi-reunion tour) backed out of what was promoted as "The Arkansas Traveler Review," the show was transformed into "The Michelle Shocked/Taj Mahal Series of Uplifting Moments." The tour had been going on for about a week, but "personality conflicts" resulted in the change.

Regardless of the "sudden" cancellation (a spokesman for Great Northeast Productions, who organized the show, admitted Saturday night The Band had pulled out as early as last Wednesday) Mahal played an inspired first set that flowed smoothly into Shocked's hour and a half show.

Shocked's combination of knee-slappin', foot-stompin' down south music coupled with a Joni Mitchell/Carole King voice created some memorable moments. With a three piece band behind her that included some high-flying fiddle licks, a mesmerizing mandolin and the banjo's sweet twang, Shocked showed why she is one of the premier female acts in the country.

Offering tunes from each of her three albums, Shocked tried to show "y'all where our musical influences come from." The upbeat "St. Anne's Reel" with the catchy "Bait your hook/Throw your line/Clean your catch" got things in a groove and led nicely to "Cripple Creek" (NOT the Band's "Up on Cripple Creek").

Shocked then led the seated version of a square dance with what she termed "The Chair Dance," complete with a down home Yee Haw.

The mellow, soothing "Silver Spoon," a song Shocked wrote for banjo/guitar player Alison Brown was an especially bright moment enhanced by Brown's accompaniment on vocals.

Mahal and Shocked combined for a rousing "That's the Way the Story Goes" after which Shocked poured it on in the homestretch introducing the brand new "Custom Cutter," about the hardships of winter wheat farming.

Add to that song list the thoughtful "Graffitti Limbo," a heartwarming "Anchorage" and the Civil War tribute "Shaking Hands/Soldier's Joy" and the result was a terrifically focused and powerful set by Shocked. The only lowpoint came when Shocked stepped up on her soapbox prior to the encore and preached her political view. (She's voting for Bill Clinton, if you cared.)

Mahal's fans were prominent in the crowd and they were certainly not disappointed with the blues master's soulful set. It included a deeply moving "Corrina," as well as the good-time "Fishin' Blues."

While the personal conflicts that caused The Band and Uncle Tupelo to leave the tour were not clear, Lou Salamone of Great Northeast Productions said Mahal was the peacemaker in the situation.

"Just give Taj his carrot juice and direct him to the stage," Salamone said.

The carrot juice certainly worked as Mahal proceeded to boogie through his set.

Full refunds were offered at the box office prior to the show but less than 50 were issued, according to Greene officials.

HSCN this week

By JAMIE GORNSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Hello, movie lovers, and welcome to yet another installment of the Campus Cable Connection. This week, we have SEX! SEX! and more SEX! on tap for you in the tastefully raunchy Tie Me Up! Tie Me Down! Also, the Halloween creepies begin early with Tales From The Darkside: The Movie. Keep it tuned to Channel 7, as it is usually more interesting than calculus (except for you actuaries who think math is more interesting than anything). Now here are the movies that will be shown beginning Wednesday, October 14.

Defcon 4 — Lenore Zann, Maury Chaykin, Kate Lynch. Well, we're off to a good start here, huh? Quite possibly the cheesiest movie to hit the silver screen in 1984. A team of astronauts return to good ol' planet Earth to find it not so good anymore. A nuclear holocaust has occurred and now the planet is being run by bad actors covered with split pea soup. Take my word for it — turn the channel. NO STARS.

Enemy Mine — Dennis Quaid, Louis Gossett, Jr., Brion James. An original story about an Earthling and a space alien deserted on a wasteland planet, once bitter enemies but forced to become friends to survive. Quite sappy and predictable at times, but Gossett's makeup is very realistically scaly and slimy. A very different role for Quaid. 1/2

Fatal Attraction — Michael Douglas, Glenn Close, Anne Archer. Okay, UMass, is there anyone out there who hasn't seen this one? Bueller? Anyone? If you have seen it, are there any men out there who would consider cheating on their wives or girlfriends with a Glenn Close look-alike? Do I hear silence? Thought so. The movie's a crowd-pleaser, that's for sure. It's pretty predictable, and I hate the fact that Close really does look fake at the end during the drowning. The acting, however, is convincing and laudable. Heck, you can always watch it again, right? ***

Glory — Denzel Washington, Matthew Broderick, Cary Elwes. Three Oscars went to this extraordinary film about a white northerner (Broderick) who is sent to train the first black regiment during the Civil War. Acting is superb all around, especially Washington, who won the Oscar for Best Supporting Actor. Intensely powerful. ****

The Naked Gun: From the Files of Police Squad — Leslie Nielsen, George Kennedy, Priscilla Presley. Hysterically zany spoof by the Zucker brothers is a laugh a minute flick about Lieutenant Frank Drebin and his "Inspector Clouseau-like" manner of solving cases. The first time I saw this movie, I laughed so hard that my cheeks felt frozen when I walked out of the theater. 1/2

A Night In The Life of Jimmy Reardon — River Phoenix, Meredith Salenger, Ann Manguson. Based on director William Richert's novel Aren't You Even Gonna Kiss Me Goodbye?, the film is drab, boring, draggy, poorly acted, but filmed well. I originally went to see it because I was 16 and in love with River Phoenix when it was released. Now I am ashamed for paying for a ticket. If you're in the mood for self-torture, by all means, turn that TV to Channel 7. Personally, I've seen more interesting videos on how to crochet potholders. 1/2*

Raw Deal — Arnold Schwarzenegger, Kathryn Harrold, Darren McGavin. Released in 1986, this movie typifies every AH-nold movie to come out around that time. He's all brawn and very little brain, and blows people away with very little effort. It makes me cringe — I'm used to seeing Arnold in more choice roles these days, so it's like a bad blast from the past. It does have some funny lines in it and Schwarzenegger is more pumped up than he is now. **

The Rose — Bette Midler, Alan Bates, Frederic Forrest. One of Midler's best performances. She portrays a woman who is stuck in the sheer and utter hell of show business. Too much of this, not enough of that... but Midler's voice makes up for it all. ***

Sister, Sister — Eric Stolz, Jennifer Jason Leigh, Judith Ivey. Two psychotic sisters turn their parents' house into a morbid guest house. Duh. It lacks... everything. Sad. However, GORNSTEIN'S GOSSIP tells us that Stolz and Leigh used to date, and now Stolz is dating Leigh's co-star from the new release Single White Female, Bridget Fonda. Hmmm, Leigh's a psycho in this movie as well as SWF... could there be any connection having to do with Stolz? NO STARS.

Steel Magnolias — Sally Field, Dolly Parton, Shirley MacLaine, Doctor Robinson! WARNING! WARNING! Tearjerker alert! Definitely a movie to see with the gals... I've not known too many men to be moved by this one, and some male critics have lambasted it. It IS sappy at times, and Sally Field reverts back to the personality (personalities) she portrayed in Sybil, but it's not one to be missed. ***

Tales From the Darkside: The Movie — Deborah Harry, Matthew Lawrence, Christian Slater. A young boy is imprisoned by a woman with the same sustenance preferences as Hannibal Lecter. He tells her three horror anecdotes to keep her from serving him as the main course for dinner. The tales are somewhat tame, but the last one packs a punch. Stories by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, Stephen King and Michael McDowell. 1/2

Tie Me Up! Tie Me Down! — Victoria Abril, Antonio Banderas, Francisco Rabal. Bizarre Spanish sex flick, originally rated X but later released with no rating. The title is inspired by some bondage in the film. This whacko kidnaps an ex-porn queen and ties her to a bed, but his intentions are different than the expected. Sound confusing? Well, it is, but it's a STEAMER, so don't miss it! 1/2

Films on HSCN this week, but are not reviewed are Top Secret, Vibes, Hudson Hawk, Stone Cold, End of the World Man, Stand By Me, King of New York and Return to the Blue Lagoon.

Go ahead, hit the couch.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): More can be accomplished if you concentrate on one goal at a time. Look at the bright side of an unusual situation. Answering letters promptly lets correspondents know that you really exist.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Balance your intuition with common sense. Be wary about lending items to relatives. You could have trouble getting them when you need them.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Accepting honors graciously wins you new admirers. Do not turn a lovers' spat into a major drama. Think of all the fun you two will have making out!

CANCER (June 21-July 22): You can achieve amazing results if you keep pushing for what you know is right. Pay attention to mail order contests. Eat hamburgers.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Your creative artistry reaches a peak today. Warm up during the morning hours. Deceptive influence could render your financial judgement unreliable. Spend money.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Meet temporary setbacks with patience and flexibility. By evening, everything will be back on track. Devote some time to planning a weekend trip. A long-cherished dream could be reality.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Get ready to play a key role at a large gathering. Higher-ups may put you in charge. Have confidence! Lots of people are doing weird things.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Do not take a trip to Disneyworld. You may be spending quite a lot of time trying to help a family member. A business matter requires mere thought.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): The mind can play tricks today. Avoid judging a book by its cover when it comes to a potential partner. Question your timing, instead.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Your personal affairs enjoy highly favorable influences today. Put a secret plan into action. Your cheerful outlook makes you popular. Giggle.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Emphasize thrift today. Untimely expenditures could cause resentment. Turn your attention to special studies or a research project. Make phone calls and run errands.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Promising opportunities are on the horizon. An evening shopping trip uncovers good values. Guard against relationship struggles. Remember, it takes two to tangle; so get out there and play the field.

administration on Thursday evening.

The graffiti has been directed to whites and blacks alike, and it is beginning to enrage both students and faculty.

"Graffiti. . . is the ultimate act of a coward," said Grant Ingle, the Director of the Office of Human Relations.

Linda Keith, co-ordinator of the Southwest Residential Area, said efforts are under way to help alleviate some of the worries and tension among residents of Washington Residence Hall.

There have also been physical attacks and threats to students tied along racial lines. A woman leaving Lederle Research Tower on Friday afternoon was attacked by two men and pushed to the ground, according to police reports.

While on the ground, one of the men struck her in the face with an unidentified object. The men then yelled a racial remark at her and fled. The woman reported the incident to police on Saturday, and helped complete composites of the two men.

From Friday morning to Monday evening alone, there were eight reports of racial graffiti around the campus, ranging from Nazi swastika's to homophobic and derogatory racial remarks, according to police.

With the rise in graffiti comes a rise in awareness, according to Keith. This translates into a rise in the number of incidents reported, which in turn gives police a better chance to apprehend the vandals.

"If we are able to catch these people, we are going to prosecute them in two ways — through the school and through the courts," Keith said.

The University can expel the students based on a violation of the Code of Student Conduct, while the courts can prosecute the individuals based on a Massachusetts state statute which bars graffiti on school grounds, punishable by imprisonment and/or stiff fines, according to Ingle.

New Ukrainian prime minister faces protests

KIEV, Ukraine (AP) — Parliament on Tuesday overwhelmingly approved Leonid Kuchma, the long-time head of the world's biggest missile plant, as Ukraine's new prime minister.

The 54-year-old rocket designer, whose predecessor resigned Oct. 2 after being accused of stalling on economic reforms, received 316 votes in the 377-member Parliament.

Outside Parliament, about 1,000 protesters tried to build a tent city, saying they would stay until new elections were called and Ukraine withdraws from the Commonwealth of Independent States.

Police broke up the effort to put up the tents, and about 20 students were injured as the crowd was dispersed. The protest briefly delayed the start of the Parliament session.

Kuchma had been considered a supporter of market reforms, and was the favorite of Ukrainian President Leonid Kravchuk, whose government of primarily former Communists had been criticized for resisting changes.

In a speech to Parliament on Tuesday, Kuchma said he favored a slow approach to economic change.

He rejected the kind of "shock therapy" reforms that were implemented in neighboring Poland, and he said a "step-by-step" approach was more suitable for Ukraine.

saying he would exercise what he called "moral leadership" to confront the issue of racism.

"Nothing is more important then providing leadership that will enhance and achieve racial harmony and peace on this campus," Hooker said.

Hooker told the audience Chancellor Richard O'Brien and other administrators will address campus safety and Upward Bound funding more aggressively.

Hooker called for the development and implementation of programs designed to increase the representation of minority students and faculty and an increase in security in residence halls. He also said university officials will undertake a study of the University's present policies on racial harassment.

have the right to work on behalf of students," Raimo said.

The students and the University are affected the most by the situation, according to Telefund spokesperson Janet Muzzy.

"We got together today to discuss the situation, since it was not the University position to negotiate. We just wanted to get back to work," Muzzy said.

The employees entered the buliding and peacefully spoke to the protestors.

"I'm not sure if the protestors knew what goes on in this building. They obviously know now," Muzzy said.

Muzzy said the work must continue and that it is imperative the fundraising campaign proceed.

"This has a direct impact on all departments, programs and most importantly the students," Muzzy said.

YanCon notes

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

With three out of their first four games on the road, and their football program supposedly in shambles, the University of Massachusetts was given about as much chance to contend for the Yankee Conference title as the Patriots were for the Super Bowl.

But while the Patriots have proven us all right the UMass football team has proven everyone wrong, going 3-1 over their first four games to remain right in the thick of the chase for YanCon supremecy.

Saturday's resounding 32-7 victory over URI bumped the Minutemen to 2-1 in YanCon play, moving UMass into fourth place in the conference.

YANKEE CONFERENCE

At this point, Delaware (4-1, 4-0 YanCon) and Villanova (5-0, 3-0 YanCon) remain atop the standings, with Delaware holding a slight edge by virtue of games played.

The Wildcats and the Blue Hens duke it out this weekend in Villanova for YanCon bragging rights, while the Minutemen come home to take on the University of Connecticut Saturday.

"We're 3-1, and we're coming home," said UMass head coach Mike Hodges after Saturday's win. "Our guys are continuing to give a good effort, and we're getting good performances. We're happy that we're winning and we can't wait to play one at home."

Hodges and the rest of the Minutemen come home riding the crest of a three-game winning streak, and are approaching UConn as if it was a championship game.

"We're going to prepare for UConn [2-3, 1-1 YanCon] just like we would any other team," said Hodges. "With Villanova coming up in two weeks, we really don't want to pick up that second conference loss yet."

The Huskies' one conference win came against New Hampshire (2-4, 0-4 YanCon), a team many figured to contend for the title.

With four conference losses under their belt, the Wildcats have now dropped out of the hunt for the Beanpot, and head coach Bill Bowes can start fine-tuning his 'Cats for next season.

Yankee Conference weekly awards: Rookie-of-the-week: None other than UMass' redshirt freshmen quarterback Andrew McNeilly, who completed 13 of 21 passes for 117 yards on Saturday. McNeilly also ran for 50 yards as the Minutemen offense exploded in a 32-7 victory over URI.

• Offensive-Player-of-the-Week: Bill Vergantino took home top prize this week, as the Fightin' Blue Hens toppled Boston University 49-14. Vergantino rushed for 57 yards and four touchdowns, while completing eight of thirteen pass attempts for 100 yards.

• Defensive-Player-of-the-Week: Villanova's Curtis Eller continued his domination of YanCon offenses, racking up an unheard of 20 unassisted tackles (23 total) as the Wildcats scraped by UConn 27-20.

Hard work pays off for George

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts fullback Mike George may not always get the exposure a flashy tailback does, but just the same, sometimes actions speak louder than words.

Such was the case on Saturday, when George's actions (17 rushes for a 128 yards) led the Minutemen to a resounding 32-7 victory over Yankee Conference rival Rhode Island.

"It's definitely one of my biggest games," said George. "But, there's no doubt in my mind that the offensive line deserves all the credit."

Running over the left side of that line most of the afternoon, George rambled over the URI defense for a career high 128 yards, earning the six-foot, 210-pound Duxbury native a spot on this week's YanCon and ECAC honor roll.

"Mike played really well," said Minuteman head coach Mike Hodges. "We just pounded the ball at them, and Mike was able to run some people over."

George has now run up 282 yards rushing on the '92 campaign, trailing Rene Ingoglia by 15 yards for the team lead.

Funny thing is, George may be the best fullback UMass almost never heard of.

As a virtual unknown in the fall of 1989, George walked on to to the Minuteman team, fighting for a spot on the UMass team as a halfback.

George's 4.7 speed in the 40 yard dash was enough to impress the Minutemen coaching staff, and George was redshirted his freshmen year.

By the beginning of his second freshmen year, the UMass coaching staff had moved George to inside linebacker, a move that would last for most of the 1990 season.

It wasn't until 1991 that George found his permanent home, lining up as the Minutemen's starting fullback in every game, while amassing 509 yards in an offense dominated by the running of tailback Jerome Bledsoe.

"Well, I'm awfully glad he decided to come to UMass," said Hodges. "It's just one of those things, where he wasn't recruited out of high school but he came here and really developed."

"Mike is just a big strong kid, and he's got the speed to match," said Hodges. "When you get someone that big who can run like Mike can, he's going to be awfully hard to stop."

Water Polo dunks competition

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

It was business as usual for the University of Massachusetts water polo team over the weekend as the 14th-ranked Minutemen won all four of their games in the second round of the Eastern Tourney at Brown University.

Despite the team's overall record of 16-1, coach Russ Yarworth believes his troops have not yet played their best polo. There isn't a coach on the planet that would mind finding fault with a team that has dismantled the opposition the way UMass has done this season.

"We played the best defense of the year," Yarworth said. "It seemed like most of the other teams' goals were scored off of unsettled situations."

The team that figured to present the Minutemen with the biggest challenge of the weekend was Richmond. The Saturday afternoon game was UMass' third of the day, while the Spiders were playing their second of the day.

"We weren't really paying attention like we should have been," Yarworth said. "I think the key to the game was how I changed defenses a couple of times. Richmond didn't respond."

UMass had three goals in the first period but went scoreless in the second, for a slim 3-2 halftime lead. Three more goals in each of the third and fourth periods iced the win.

Jeremy Alters had a hat trick and an assist and Tsan Engin added two goals and one assist. Dan McOsker scored twice and Jay Peluso and Javier Gonzalez added one each.

Goalie Alex Mujica recorded 9 saves.

The weekend's first game was a 16-7 pasting over an out-classed George Washington team. After erupting to a 10-2 halftime lead the Minutemen coasted.

Alters, Gonzalez and freshman Fransisco Mariani all tallied three goals. Dan MaAuliffe scored twice and Denny Kinne, Luke Harlan, Scott Reed, Charlie Dunn and Engin each scored once.

Mujica stopped 10 shots during game one's blowout.

The day's second game was an easy 12-3 win over Army, who the Minutemen beat for the second time this season.

Gonzalez and Alters each scored three times and Harlan scored twice. Peluso, Engin, Reed, Mariani and John Luviano each tallied one goal.

Mujica had 10 saves for the second straight game.

The weekend wrapped up with Sunday's 12-5 win over Bucknell. After jumping out to a 6-3 lead at the half, UMass exploded for five goals in the third to pull away to stay.

Alters scored three times, and Gonzalez and Engin each scored twice. Adolpho Oliete, Peluso, Reed, McOsker and Mariani each added one goal.

Goalie Todd Hourihan had 14 saves.

Minutewomen travel to Dartmouth today

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Sometimes Ivy League isn't better.

When the University of Massachusetts field hockey team takes the field in Hanover, New Hampshire today against Dartmouth, it will show the Big Green how the game is played outside the Ivy League.

The No. 4 team in the country, Massachusetts (11-1) will start their three-game road trip against a 3-4-1 Dartmouth which is struggling. However, where some people see an easy win, UMass head coach Pam Hixon is wary.

"Their record is very deceptive," said Hixon. "They've played a number of teams tough, two into overtime before losing. I don't think their record is very indicative of how good they are."

Because of the academic strength of the institutions, Ivy League schools typically recruit excellent all-around athletes who may not be superstars at any one particular sport.

"They're really feisty, they usually have lots of athletic ability," Hixon said. "Typically, their players play field hockey in the fall, ice hockey in the winter, and then some other sport in the spring. When you have players out there with an ice hockey mentality, you know they'll be tough competitors."

The Minutewomen are led by the trio of forwards Ainslee Press, Jenn Salisbury and Tara Jelley, who have combined for 31 points so far this season. Press, a senior, leads the team with 15 points on 13 goals. Salisbury and Jelley, both juniors, have scored six and four goals, respectively.

In order to score on Dartmouth, they'll have to get past goaltender Lauren Demski, a native of Northampton. Demski, a freshman, has started every game, accumulating a 1.38 goals-against average. She was nationally ranked at the beginning of the season, but as the Big Green has fallen on hard times, so has Demski.

The Dartmouth offense has been impotent, as the team leader, Christina Caputo, has only five goals. Senior Jen Hanley has tied for the team lead with five points.

"I know one thing, they'll definitely be coming out wanting to beat us," said Jelley.

Hooker says UM neglected racial issues

By JEFF DONN
Associated Press

AMHERST — The head of the state university system faulted past campus leaders Wednesday for failing to cool long-simmering racial tension that spurred this semester's rash of attacks and graffiti.

Even as he spoke, campus officials reported another alleged assault and wave of dormitory graffiti directed against blacks, whites, Jews and homosexuals.

"We were shocked by the number of incidents," said school spokeswoman Kay Scanlan. "It's a graphic example of the tensions that exist on campus."

Michael Hooker, president of the five-campus system, came to campus to listen to angry minority students and faculty at a daylong series of meetings Tuesday.

He told trustees Wednesday at their meeting in the Campus Center that "ultimately the problem is the culture on campus."

He called demands of campus minorities "reasonable and in the right spirit."

"The reflect 15 years of inadequate attention to their concerns on this campus," he said.

Hooker, who took over as president in September, is widely credited with making a fuller place for minorities and promoting racial harmony during his six years as president of the University of Maryland-Baltimore County.

Hooker's predecessor, Joseph Duffey, said Wednesday that his own nine-year tenure showed progress in recruitment of minority faculty and some other areas.

Speaking in a telephone interview, he also said racial tensions on campus are "exacerbated by adolescent hooliganism, as well as alcohol" that makes people drop their inhibitions. "The campus does not like to hear this," added Duffey, who is now president of American University in Washington, D.C.

Much of the recent turmoil at this Amherst campus centers on an assault Sept. 25 on a black student working as a dormitory supervisor. The student, Arlens Barosy, says he was punched and subjected to a racial slur by a white attacker after asking a group of whites to stop drinking.

Keg law receives criticism

Town officials pleased, but students find policy unfair

MATT KAHN / COLLEGIAN
These kegs, and many more like them, are the subjects of much controversy in Amherst following the passage of a keg licensing bylaw last spring.

By MICHELLE BAYLISS

While many Amherst town officials feel the new keg policy is working effectively by encouraging responsible drinking, many students at the University of Massachusetts think it's ludicrous.

"It's pretty ridiculous," said Karl Borg, 22, a senior mechanical engineering major. "It's an unfair attempt by Amherst residents to control college students."

Last April, the Amherst Select Board voted to implement the policy which requires students to obtain a license to possess a beer keg within town limits.

The penalty for violation of the law includes a fine of $200 for the first offense, and upwards of $300 for each subsequent offense.

The bylaw's purpose is to protect the health, safety and welfare of its inhabitants. But many students think it is just another way for the town to control students and help police pinpoint where parties are going to take place.

"First a dry campus, now they're checking I.D.'s uptown. What do they expect us to do?" said Borg. "I think it sucks."

Senior legal studies major Brendon Moyer, 21, said he feels the recently-enacted law is unnecessary.

"Enforcement [of the law] is horrible," said Moyer. "We're just being hassled because we're students."

Amherst Police Captain Charlie Scherpa, who thinks the law is "working out fine," said a majority of all town alcohol-related disturbances, including off-campus parties, are caused by UMass students.

On any given weekend, Scherpa said he receives from five to 40 noise complaints from Amherst residents. Since April, he said only 40 to 50 people have been charged with violating the law.

"I do think alcohol-related behaviors have been reduced," said Scherpa. "It's bringing about responsible drinking."

Although Amherst Police Chief Donald Maia said it's too soon to pass judgement on the keg law, he believes it's stemming the abuse of alcohol by minors.

"It's not designed to curtail the lawful dispersing of alcohol. If you're going to have a party, you should be doing the right thing," said Maia. "Once people realize the law isn't to stop people, just place responsiblity, I think it will go fine."

Intramurals on the mark

Program provides a 'sport for everyone'

By MICHAEL R. LINSKEY
Collegian Staff

Because of the extreme competitiveness of varsity sports competition at the University of Massachusetts, many high school athletes end their athletic careers prematurely when they arrive at UMass.

But even if you're not quite good enough to catch Coach Calipari's eye when he's out recruiting for the men's basketball team, take heart athletes. Three officials of the University's Intramurals Office say there is life after high school varsity competition.

Dr. Franklin C. Wright, director of Intramurals, Zulma C. Garcia, associate director of Intramurals and Kirstie Delbrugge, the newly-hired assistant director of Intramurals, said yesterday if students are looking for an activity or even a career, the Intramurals office is a good place to start.

"We have a `sport for everyone, and everyone for a sport' mentality here," said Garcia. "One of my biggest goals is student development. We've had many people from the university graduate and become athletic officials as a result of their experiences here. It's a good way to get career experience."

Wright echoed this sentiment, saying his personal goal for the intramural program is to "provide some form of physical activity for all members of the university community."

From badminton to basketball

Garcia provided a schedule showing that activities such as flag football, soccer, tennis, badminton, racquetball, track and field, ice hockey, volleyball and basketball are either presently being offered or will be by the end of fall semester. Additional sports will be offered in the spring.

Garcia said teams are divided into three categories — men's, women's, and co-rec teams — and that teams in each category compete against one another once a week for five weeks. Each category of each sport crowns a champion at the end of competitive play.

She also said, however, that in order to create a championship team, students must take that all-important step of organizing themselves and signing up.

"Usually, one person takes it upon himself to become team captain," she said. "Sometimes, R.A.'s will do it as a floor activity. They'll come by the office, pick up

UMass prof. helps Democrats

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

The chairperson of the University of Massachusetts department of communication is putting her two cents in the Democratic Party's campaign by helping stage the messages they're sending out.

Professor Jarice Hanson has been advising Hillary Clinton and Tipper Gore during this campaign on how to address the issues of abortion, health and women's issues. The two are seeking ways to best emulate the Democratic Party platform and to reach women voters.

Hanson is part of a speech training group, Sheehan Associates of Washington D.C., which helps orchestrate speeches for the Democratic National Party.

Hanson also worked on the 1992 Democratic Party platform and on strategy for this year's Presidential debates for the Democratic Party.

Hanson said she she supports Bill Clinton because she thinks he could make real change that would benefit the country. "And Hillary could make real positive changes for women and children," Hanson said.

Recent incidents recorded by the University's Department of Public Safety.

• Staff from the Computing Information Systems office reported the theft of a display wall telephone to police on Tuesday. The phone, which was discovered stolen at about 3:20 p.m., was worth $562, according to police.

• University police received a report of stolen hubcaps from a man on Tuesday evening. At approximately 8:30 p.m., the man discovered the hubcaps from his truck, which was parked in Lot 44, were stolen. Police estimate the value of the hubcaps to be $135.

Cable bill could lower rates

By STEPHANIE SCHOROW
Associated Press

BOSTON — No accident, perhaps, that the first time that Congress managed to muster enough votes for an override of a veto by President Bush, the issue was cable television.

Politicians — Dan Quayle among them — have learned it's not wise to come between viewers and their TV sets.

But now that the rhetoric has cooled over the just-passed cable television bill, New England cable subscribers anxious to see a difference in their bills will have to wait at least six months to a year.

And some may wait indefinitely.

"Because the Federal Communications Commission has yet to write specific guidelines for the cable television bill, the impact on rates and services here remains unclear," said Thomas M. Steel Jr., vice president of New England Cable Association.

"It all depends on how the FCC establishes the rate-making rules," he said.

Passed last week over Bush's veto, the complicated bill sets general guidelines requiring cable companies to provide basic cable service at a reasonable rate and allows consumers to protest rates they consider unreasonable.

Specific rules have been left up to the FCC to work out, a process that could take months. Important details, including the definition of what constitutes "unreasonable " rates, remain to be determined.

"It now falls to the FCC to determine what is the basic service and give some direction in regards to price. In the absence of those rules, it's difficult to predict what the future will be," said Charles Schueler, spokesman for Cablevision, one of the more than 40 cable companies serving 3.5 million cable subscribers in New England.

"Perhaps the most immediate impact of the new law will be a requirement that companies provide basic cable service at a cheaper rate," said Thomas Cohan, director of cable communications for the city of Boston.

Viewers, most often the elderly, who just want cable for the clear reception will probably end up paying between $5 and $10 a month for basic service, which includes the broadcast channels, plus education and public access systems.

Those who already subscribe to a second tier of service — including CNN, C-SPAN and MTV — will probably not see a change in their rates, Cohan said. But viewers who want to subscribe to a premium service — such as HBO — will be able to do so without first subscribing to a second tier of service.

"With this basic service, rates will go down but you won't be getting much," Cohan said. "If you thrive on CNN, you may not be happy with that."

Most consumer complaints in the Boston area currently center around the cost of equipment often needed to get service, including monthly fees for remote controls and conversion boxes, he said. The FCC has been charged with establishing guidelines for consumers who wish to buy equipment.

Caffeine deficit good excuse to stay in bed

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Coffee addicts take note: Even those who drink just two or three cups a day may feel depressed, anxious, sluggish and headachy if they suddenly give up their caffeine fix, a study shows.

Experts have long recognized that heavy users may feel out of sorts if they go cold turkey. But the new work suggests that the millions of Americans who consume moderate amounts of coffee, tea or caffeinated soda may also feel not quite themselves if they miss daily jolt.

In fact, for some people, giving up caffeine can trigger sick- in-bed symptoms as bad as the flu or worse. One woman who took part in the experiment said going without caffeine made her feel as awful as getting cancer chemotherapy.

"We showed a severe withdrawal syndrome at the usual dietary doses of caffeine," said Dr. Roland R. Griffiths, senior author of the study at Johns Hopkins University.

The symptoms reach their worst after a day or two and then usually taper off within a week. People who want to give up their coffee or their caffeine-laced drinks can do so painlessly simply by gradually cutting back over a few days.

The study, published in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine, was conducted on 44 women and 18 men who ranged in age from 18 to 50, all of them average caffeine users. The subjects were told they were taking part in research looking at the effects of chemicals in their food.

They were asked to avoid consuming anything with caffeine and a variety of other substances. Then they were given capsules containing either sugar or the amount of caffeine in 2 1/2 cups of coffee.

On their caffeine free days, half of the participants suffered through moderate to severe headaches. About 10 percent complained of fatigue, depression, anxiety and moodiness. These symptoms were rare on days when they were getting caffeine.

Griffiths said his work does not imply that caffeine is unhealthy. "It's not bad as long as you keep taking it," he said.

He said the work also has implications for doctors. For instance, when patients come in complaining of headaches, fatigue and other such symptoms, doctors should ask them about the possibility of caffeine withdrawal.

Rivalry not taken for Granite

In New Hampshire, two of the state's public universities are waging a battle for supremacy in the Granite Sate.

Recently The Equinox, the student newspaper of Keene State College, took some students at the University of New Hampshire to task for a lack of sensitivity concerning sexual acts.

The Equinox cited in an Oct. 7 editorial an incident where UNH athletes jeered and heckled actors in a program enacted to increase sexual crime awareness. The Equinox stated the participants "displayed disrespectful and rude attitudes reminiscent of junior high students, at one point yelling 'fag' and 'homosexual' to one man dealing with the sexual abuse he received as a child at the hands of an older man."

The editorial called Keene State a school with a dream named Vision 2000, which is a plan which calls for the transformation of Keene State into the public, undergraduate school of choice in New Hampshire by the year 2000.

The Equinox claims UNH students are living by a plan called Vision 1000 and at least in the area of sexual crime awareness Keene State has already surpassed the state's flagship school in Durham.

The editorial also claims that with the negative publicity coming from the event, Keene State is closing the gap on UNH.

What seems most interesting to me is that a competition is being waged between the two schools.

However, although Vision 2000 seems to be a big deal at Keene State, the few staffers at the UNH student newspaper which I spoke with were unaware there was even a contest going on. They also felt UNH was secure in its position of the premiere public university in New Hampshire.

Tequila or to-kill-ya

A jury in Texas found a tequila maker partly responsible for the death of a Texas Agricultural and Industrial University student, according to The Daily Texan, the student newspaper of the University of Texas at Austin.

The jury found the Brown-Forman Co. of Lexington Ky. guilty for one-third of the death of Marie Brinkman. Brinkman, 18, had died as a result of alcohol poisoning after consuming some 20 shots of Pepe Lopez tequila at a party.

Brinkman's family was awarded $1.5 million despite the fact the jury found Brinkman two-thirds responsible for her death. Brown-Forman officials issued a statement disagreeing with the verdict and saying the company planned to appeal.

"This case involves a tragic accident, but we believe the young woman herself was responsible for it," the statement said.

The suit contended Brown-Forman was negligent because it failed to warn consumers that drinking to much alcohol too quickly could be fatal.

A sobering subject

Researchers from the College of William & Mary and Southern Illinois University have come to the shocking conclusion that students who earn Ds and Fs drink more than those on the Dean's List.

The study shows that on average students with GPAs of 3.5 or above consume 3.45 drinks per week and students with GPAs below 1.0 suck down 10.87 drinks. B students averaged 4.95 drinks a week while C students take in 6.77 alcoholic beverages each week.

The study did not find out what kind of GPA the tequila chugging Marie Brinkman (see above) would be likely to receive. My prediction is not as high as her blood alcohol level.

Philip Meilman, primary researcher from William & Mary said, "There had to be an interaction somewhere — if you're intoxicated or hung over, you can't study."

A U.S. Department of Education grant, for an unknown amount of money, paid for the survey which questioned more than 56,000 students at 78 schools nationwide.

Pardon my fiscal conservatism, but if you are looking for governmental waste, here is a perfect example. The Feds could have saved some dough because for 20 bucks and with zero research I could have come to the same conclusion.

State rep. says minorities and women face similar obstacles

By EMILY GOLD
Collegian Correspondent

State Representative Ellen Story drew parallels between the difficulties experienced by both women and minorities in their quest for social and political economy in a speech Wednesday. Speaking to the Amherst Area Branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Story noted the relationship between women and minorities and of the leaders in the women's and civil rights movements.

"The struggle for the rights of one group has always influenced the other," she said. "There is a long historical connection [between minority and women's rights.]"

Among the similar injustices Story cited were exclusion from politics, unfair wages and training in the workplace and a lack of equal education.

"There are many areas where important work needs to be done," said Story. "[We need] enforcement of laws against discrimination and we need to make good education available and valued."

Following her speech, Story answered questions from the committee, mainly concerning her role as a state representative.

According to branch President Reynolds Winslow, the Amherst chapter, formed two years ago, consists of community members and deals with racial issues in the area.

"We have several areas of concern," said Winslow. "Historically, we are concerned with education, housing and civil rights, and topically we have a major concern of tracking youngsters in Amherst.

In response to the recent racial incidents on the UMass campus, the Amherst branch issued a press release condemning the violence.

"Historically, we are concerened with education, housing and civil rights."
State Representative Ellen Story

The statement said, "We deplore the most recent visible occurrence of racial violence at Washington Tower at the UMass Amherst campus. We would hope that the District Attorney's office would pursue this matter vigorously."

The statement called for the university administration to conduct a full investigation of the incident. Finally, the statement called for continuing the thrust of the MCAD Hurst report and the Tillis report, both of which emerged in the wake racial violence on campus following the 1986 Red Sox-Mets World Series.

According to Story, other community members have responded to the recent violence.

"People have been absolutely appalled at the things they've been reading in the paper lately," she said.

SGA spars with UM Bike Club over financing

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate denied a request from the University's Bicycle Racing Club for an $8,963 loan, based on what the Senate's Budget Chair called the group's "financial irresponsibility."

Budget Chair Emily Rose said she had no problem with loaning the six-year old club $5,460 to cover its debts and to allow it to raise revenue, but said she felt the additional sum of $3,103 was too much to ask of the SGA.

"The Bicycle Racing Club must prove themselves to be a stable and responsible organization by making some revenue," said Rose.

The SGA approved the newly-proposed $5,460 loan to the club.

Sebastian Laurent, treasurer of the club, said he made an accounting error and accidentally spent $3,860 which the club did not have.

Laurent said the club stopped payment on a check of about $3,800 in January and it took the Student Activities Office three months to take it off the club's account.

"I'm new to the system and I didn't realize it is standard for the SAO to take three months to take the money out of the account after stopping payment on a check," Laurent said.

Rose said she did not believe Laurent had a legitimate

UM alumni lead prayer meeting

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship held a prayer meeting yesterday as part of the group's efforts to provide a non-threatening atmosphere for students to express concerns over recent events on campus.

Jenny Martin, a 1988 graduate of UMass, led the group in a moment of quiet prayer, and asked students present to pray for their friends, students, families and the nation. Approximately 10-15 students participated in the prayer for healing and direction in their lives and the crisis on this campus. The meeting was held in the Campus Center.

Jim Martin, co-leader and a 1987 UMass graduate, said he believes that participation and providing a safe place for students to express their concerns and feelings is badly needed.

"We need to be peacemakers and bring reconciliation," Martin said.

Pastor Jose Pagan of the First Hispanic Church of Amherst also attended the meeting.

"I've come to this meeting to try and unite the races, pray for God to open the eyes of our leaders and break down the walls of division," Pagan said in an emotional prayer.

It's time for Civility 101

Listening to students addressing the University president, chancellor and trustees Tuesday night in the Malcolm X Center reminded me of a woman who once told me I needed to take a diversity class. At the time I disagreed. But after working at the Collegian over the next year or so I learned a lot about race and discrimination I didn't know before. At times, I learned the hard way.

Robert Fulghum was wrong. I didn't learn everything I needed to know in kindergarten. I learned to be respectful, polite, to share and use "please" and "thank you." Kindergarten never taught me anything about racism.

Marc
ELLIOTT

"I'm used to teaching the White students about my culture," said one of the Black students at Tuesday's meeting. He's right. Diversity is one of the biggest classes we have here at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. We're all enrolled in it and some of us have been forced to teach it — whether we want to or not. For those White students who had never been friends with, talked to, or even seen an African-American, Asian, Hispanic or Native American before coming to Amherst, they are getting an education in a subject which will, and has, shaped the world.

But minority students have been forced to teach this class. Most, I'd guess, would rather not. They don't get paid for it. It takes time away from their studies. It wears on their spirits. And we White students can be pretty thick.

It's time to give our teachers a hand. We'll never be able to take the burden completely off their hands. Unfortunately, there will always be people who need the lesson. But the University can help. It's time for Civility 101.

Currently all UMass students have to satisfy the diversity requirement. But many of these diversity classes don't serve the purpose for which they were intended. Many of them never touch on racism, sexism or homophobia. Hardly any touch on all three. Besides, students could conceivably avoid these classes right up until their last semester. There's no telling how much damage their ignorance could have wrought by that time.

We need Civility 101, a class in respect. It would be mandatory for all incoming freshman. Everyone has to take it their first semester. Some of the lessons would involve reteaching old kindergarten material: please, thank you, sharing. But much more would be added. The class would last the entire semester and teach one lesson. People — Black, White, Hispanic, Jewish, Native American, homosexuals, bisexuals, men, women — are people. They love, hate, feel, hurt, and with patience, they can understand one another.

We need to know what hurts. We need to learn how not to hurt. We need some damn good professionals to teach us.

I don't know exactly what the lesson plan will be. I'd expect it will be mostly history. It could turn out to be the most valuable and eye-opening class a student takes here.

This class won't eliminate racism from the student body. People don't usually learn unless they want to. But it could clear up some stereotypes and common myths. It would definitely take some of the pressure off our student teachers.

Maybe it'll even prevent some students down the road from learning the hard way.

Movements must seek to gain unity in diversity

I tried to keep silent. I tried to listen patiently. I tried to understand how people were feeling — what they were thinking. I tried to keep my mouth shut all the while keeping my mind open — I will be silent no longer. Frankly, I'm too damn angry and frustrated.

For just a second I'm asking you to get down off your soapboxes, come down to earth and listen — yes, listen. Put your egos, threats and megaphones aside.

E.C.
THOMAS

I have been a strong advocate of equality for some time now. I was lucky my parents taught me this concept. They didn't teach me that one's mind was between one's legs; they taught me that it was between two opened eyes. And they didn't teach me black and white; they taught me gray.

Unfortunately there are those on this campus who have learned differently. To those, I look at you with eyes of disgust and sorrow. You are the rotten apples in this orchard called UMass. But the chastising that has gone on the last couple of weeks has become nothing but a stage for self-serving individuals to grab the spotlight.

Have you ever noticed that the same names keep appearing in the media? The quotes, the statements, the "reforming" remarks, all followed by one of the names with in a small group. These passionate fighters for liberty seem to be a very elitist group. After all, they are the only ones with opinions — the only ones with a worthy cause.

How about all these racial discussions the administration keeps calling? Everyone runs to the microphone to say the same thing as the last person, only in a louder tone of voice and with more adjectives. You'd think that these discussions were only competitions to see who could get the greatest amount of applause.

Everyone's been yelling their threats and sermons so loud and for so long that their eyes have narrowed shut. Don't you see what's going on around you? You're going in circles. People who have advocated your cause are walking away — and it's your own fault. You have succeeded in alienating over half of the campus community because you have continually been pointing one finger in blame and the other in threat. Nothing will get accomplished on this campus without support from the community. Do you think that these isolation tactics will gain their commitment?

The fight to end racism is a just and admirable one, but it can not be solved overnight and it cannot be solved without productive discussion between all people. All people — not just one colored group.

You cannot place your stereotypes on one group while fighting for the removal of them from your own. It is counter-productice and only serves to increase the tension that pervades this campus. We have become a large mass segregated from each other, and we are the ones responsible for the segregation. Closed meetings, marches and protests cannot and will not solve an issue that concerns all of us.

We have all been walking on eggshells these last few weeks. We walk in shoes of anxiety and fear with our heads hanging low. The constant threats of violence that have taken place are not passionate prose that promote change. They are irresponsible diatribes that promote fear and gridlock. There only success is in magnifying this problem into something that could soon lead to uncontrolled chaos. Violence is what sparked this issue — are we just going to revert back to it?

It is time to stop the preaching, threatening and yelling and sit with an open mind and listen. The administration has called several meetings to discuss these issues; it's time we used these meetings to our advantage. We need to listen to each other's solutions and work together to implement them. Screaming at the administration will not get them to listen to us — neither will taking over a building. To have successful discussions that produce feasible solutions, we all need to communicate. Communication leads to education — the administration is in great need of education, and we can teach them. We have the potential for that power, but only if we work together, and we work peacefully.

I will no longer accept being called a racist because I do not suuport your tactics in our movement. Change will not happen when you follow your own agendas and stop listening to the other voices around you.

"From the pain come the dream, from the dream come the vision, from the vision come the people and from the people come the power. From this power come the change," writes Peter Gabriel.

We have the ability to gain this power — but it needs to come from all peoples, in order to survive and conquer its enemies. The more united we are, the stronger our power; from this unity will come change. Together we can take a step forward, instead of three steps back.

Hillel fights racism with education

Hillel wishes to express its anger and sadness over the recent events in Washington Tower. The news of such a vulgar racist assault, both verbally and physically, against Arlens Barosy was deeply disturbing.

However, as Jewish students at UMass, we are all too aware that the violence afflicting Mr. Barosy is far from an aberration. Rather, this display of racism is indicative of the growing number of hate crimes on campus.

The time has come to not only condemn such expressions of prejudice, but to take constructive action as well. The University must make the fighting of racism and other hate crimes into a top priority. Students must take the initiative and exert pressure on the University to reach new standards in the department of civility.

The student body must attack racism, through educational programs and by confronting prejudices in our home communities. Hillel has made a commitment to educating the Jewish people on the aspirations of other peoples and urges Jewish students to actively fight against racial divisions on campus.

Josh Slomich, President
Hillel Council

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

The Graduate Student Voice, once a timid, one-man operation, is quickly establishing for itself a reputation as the pulpit of choice for previously unpublished graduate creative writing students and historical revisionists. In an unprecedented gesture of equanimity they have become the the first paper on campus to institute a an affirmative action policy for poor writers.

In October, the Voice gained the distinction of being the first periodical to publish nude photography since its sale was banned on campus. This is strange behavior from a group that proclaims so passionately its compassion for women of color. It may be ethically questionable, but it sure flies off the newsstand.

While I'm on the topic, I'm flattered that my careless uttering has been selected as "Quote of the month." In a discussion with a Voice staff member I said, "If you're going to have a women of color page, why not a page for blonde, blue-eyed, slightly balding left-handed dyslexics?"

I can't say that I'm surprised the quote was not carried in its entirety. Many on the Voice staff have a history of taking artistic license with the facts.

My clumsily-stated point was that further dividing and institutionalizing an already stratified society seems more likely to support and legitimate the existing, unacknowledged caste system than it is to solve the problem. Perhaps there are better ways to promote unity than preaching to the converted from the Student Union steps and pleading with the governor to rename holidays.

At any rate, her reply to my suggestion was, "Well, if they are an historically oppressed community, why not?" I'm here to argue that we are.

Josh
REYNOLDS

Lefties (I prefer the term "Unconventionally Dextrous") make up only five percent of the population. Whenever I reach to open a door, shake someone's hand, or use a pair of scissors I am graphically reminded of the oppression my people have gone through. At least they're not trying to cure us anymore.

Blond males suffer disproportionately from color-blindness and childhood hyperactivity. I'm sure everyone has heard enough blond jokes and seen enough Cy Sperling commercials to know that the accumulation of such appearance-based discrimination can really bruise one's self-esteem.

Back in grammar school I was discovered to be mildly learning disabled. With the help of vigilant editors I've managed to adapt, but I have friends who, despite being obviously intelligent people, have found themselves unable to fulfill the university's mindlessly rigid Gen-Ed requirements.

Furthermore, I was dismayed to discover that the Collegian itself is part of the problem. Though there are hundreds of us on campus, the Collegian has hired no dyslexic copy editors. It is time for the dyslexics of the world to unite against the systematic oppression which has held us down for so long. LD's are asked to join me in a sit-in at the Collegian offices until they agree to correct this aberration and disable their spell-checker.

This action will be followed by a teach-in/occupation at the hopelessly inadequate learning disabled students office. This tool of the "normalist" bureaucracy is designed to adapt us to the humiliations and feelings of inadequacy which LDs face daily. I plan to stay until the University agrees to remove dictionaries from the library, and put an end to the humiliation of undergrads and the perpetuation of "normalist" values in children by hosting grammar school spelling bees. Also, "correct" spelling should be optional on all papers and tests.

These proposals are non-negotiable. Allies stay clear. This is our fight. Bring your sleeping bags, this will be a long struggle.

With promises rather than action, history repeats itself

Platitudes and promises are easily offered. Actions to back them up come much more slowly, if they come at all. That's the lesson that's been pushed in our faces for the past week. It's a lesson we should've learned long ago.

A little historical perspective, please: those surprised by the stupidity that went down in Washington Tower two weeks ago, or by the Black community's response to it, should take a look back at what happened on those same pyramids six years ago this month, and how this University's administration reacted. The parallels should scare you stiff.

For those unfamiliar, here's a brief synopsis. After Game 7 of the 1986 Red Sox-Mets World Series, tensions between angry Sox fans and jubilant Mets fans deteriorated into racial violence in Southwest. Ten were injured, some seriously.

Those dissatisfied with the current administration's reaction to what went down in Washington would've absolutely freaked at what the administration of six years ago did when confronted with the '86 riot. The University at first tried to pass the riot off as merely drunken and angry baseball fans, denying anything racial had anything to do with it. This only worsened tensions.

Next, the University, having admitted there was a problem, commissioned a study into the incident by local judge Frederick A. Hurst. Hurst's investigation wasn't perfect, but it clearly identified racial tensions on campus and made concrete suggestions about how to improve the campus' racial climate. Naturally, the University didn't enforce most of Hurst's suggestions, but at least it was a start.

There were lots of speeches and platitudes about how the University was committed to banishing racism from this campus — just like the one given by President Michael Hooker yesterday.

Greg
SUKIENNIK

No one doubts Hooker's sincerity about turning this campus around, and few doubted the sincerity of David Knapp or Joseph Duffey, respectively the president and chancellor six years ago. But the best intentions often go awry. It's easy for administrators to say they'll do something, but a lot harder for them to actually do it. Sometimes it's downright impossible.

But even given the energetic approach Hooker pledged himself to — and from me to you, Mike, I wish you the best and hope you succeed — there's little any administration, anywhere, can do if we, the people they govern, will not change ourselves.

Take Sunday's presidential debates (please!). All three candidates offered soaring platitudes about doing all they could to end this nation's racial divisions. When it comes right down to it, though, they can't do jack if the American people stay bound and determined to hate each other until we're all dead at each others' hands.

So here's the point: we've seen this all before and we're still back at square one. Why? It's not entirely the administration's fault, although they've mastered the knee-jerk reaction to problems (hindsight — it's still 20/20) they could have met head-on. The administration is powerless to change one damned thing if we refuse to let that change happen.

It's too easy to get into an "us and them" attitude when events which divide us occur. Well, here's a news flash. There is no them. There is only us.

Until we, the human race, somehow decide our differences will no longer come between us, no platitudes, speeches, takeovers, days of action, laws or rallies will change us. We'll just keep attacking one another like dinosaurs, confused by blind rage and fear of what we don't understand.

You know what became of the dinosaurs.

Political distortion on TV

"With the incredible economic difficulties facing our nation's cities," began the moderator, "how would your administration tackle these problems? We start with Mr. Quayle."

Dan looked grim. "Our problems stem from the failed social programs of the Democratic leadership in Congress, but it really comes down to the disintegration of the American family." He meshed together his fingers to demonstrate. "And you just can't trust Bill Clinton to do that.

Nathan
CRICK

Admiral Stockdale tried to maneuver so he could see over the podium. "Well, uh, the cities' problems are because we don't have leaders. Yeah, we need leaders. I was, there the, you know? I headed a whole society of four hundred men, back then, back there. It was really good, had our own laws and values, and we said `BACK US.' And it didn't just mean `us,' it meant U.S. A little double meaning there," he ended, falling back, disoriented.

Al Gore did his best impression of a wooden post. "The United States are in this state because of 12 years of Republican leadership. Bill Clinton has proposed plans that will help retrain workers, bring jobs into inner cities and cut taxes on the middle class." He shifted slightly and resumed the post position. "But you don't help things by subsidizing businesses to move overseas."

Quayle laughed his Quayle laugh. "That charge is utterly ridiculous. How can you trust Bill Clinton with these charges?"

"Now Dan," began Gore with soothing hand gestures. "You know you did. It has been fully investigated by '60 Minutes,' 'Nightline' and Star magazine."

"And you know full well you voted for the Caribbean Base initiative, Al," retorted Quayle out of nowhere.

"No," said Gore calmly. Admiral Stockdale reeled.

Quayle laughed again. "But you did!"

"No, I didn't."

"But I have proof!" hyperventilated Quayle. "Proof, dammit!"

"No, you don't," said Gore matter-of-factly.

"Would you like to say anything, Admiral Stockdale?" asked the moderator.

Stockdale broke out of his daze. "What? My hearing aid's off."

"Do you have anything to add?"

"To what? What the hell are they talking about?" he asked. "I can't see a damn thing."

"I'll take his time!" chimed in Quayle and Gore. Stockdale stumbled backwards again.

Quayle jumped in. "Clinton and Gore are going to ruin our industry by their tax-and-spend programs! He's going to raise taxes all the way down to anyone above $36,000!" he cried.

"You're wrong," said Gore, shaking his head.

Dan started turning that shade of pink. "See! See! He's pulling a Clinton again! What do you say to that, Senator?" Gore moved his arm and moved to speak.

"Answer my question, Al! You're hedging!"

Gore pointed back at Quayle. "No, you're the one avoiding the issue, Dan. Why didn't you answer my question?"

Quayle turned his pink face to the camera. "See, Clinton just cannot tell the truth."

"You're the one who's lying," said Gore.

Admiral Stockdale suddenly came alive. "I think tonight you're seeing the reason that nothing is getting done in Washington."

It is ironic that the one piece of wisdom was from Stockdale, the man who criticized environmentalism by claiming if you clean the water too much you'll kill the water lilies. It's just unfortunate that in November we will find ourselves voting for the idea of Bill Clinton instead of the man himself.

APO wants to get to know you

Mr. Roberts, I read your article (Collegian, Oct. 8) "Rush week disappoints," and would like to introduce you to another type of brotherhood. I am a brother of Alpha Phi Omega. Yes, a brother, not a sister. We are a national co-ed service fraternity based on the principled of leadership, friendship and service. The strongest attribute of our fraternity is the brotherhood which does not stand for manhood but for strongly bound friendships.

As Membership Vice President of APO, I cannot imagine choosing pledges from individuals I have yet to know. Anyone is allowed to pledge our fraternity. It should be their decision, not ours. What makes our fraternity a brotherhood is the diversity within our group. Our members have different sexes, religions, races, majors and preferences. I've met many people I never would have if I had only bid for individuals like myself.

We've finished our rush period, but we always welcome anyone interested in pledging or just participating in our service projects. If you, Mr. Roberts, or anyone else, would like to find out more, we are in Student Union Room 415A.

We are proud of who we are and what we stand for. We are proud of the people we were able to meet and the prejudices we have learned to drop because we have gotten to know the person behind the name and face.

Split forces can't move forward

I do not know how to deal with the separation of races at UMass. First off, I am angry because I feel the administration has handled these incidents poorly by not taking control of the situation right away. But what is crazy is that instead of coming together and working to fight ignorance, we have split into minorities and Whites.

When I found out the rally at Washington was for minorities only, I thought, "What?" I'm not welcome even though I want to voice my opinions and make changes too? Because I'm White? What s— is that? The fact that I was shunned because of the color of my skin pissed me off; I don't do that to other people. I don't want to see all White people stereotyped as the guy who assaulted Arlens Barosy. I was a minority in my schools. I've been pushed around by enough races, including my own, that if there were a good reason to hate people, I could hate just about everybody. But what good would that do?

Since I wasn't wanted at the protest, I went to a meeting of "White allies of minorities," which helped get rid of some of my anger about these racial incidents. I understand time was needed for the minorities to make a stand, but the stand would be bigger is everyone got together.

So why am I still so damn angry?. From what I witnessed Thursday night, we weren't listening to each other. The frustration and anger is understandable and justifies, but the separation, the stereotypes is not. What is important is that our values and feelings are the same. There are racist fools on this campus from every race, but they are the minority when compared to those who feel what's going on is terribly wrong.

To the best of my abilities I can understand the anger and distrust minorities feel toward Whites because of what has happened over the years. Now is the time to move ahead by understanding that there are those of every race who share similar values and can be trusted. Am I the only person so outraged that I'm seriously wondering just what kind of school I enrolled in?

Bush threatens choice

I am writing in response to the misinformed, ignorant and humorless article by Chris Petropoulos on why us "fishhead boys and fishhead girls" should vote for Bush (Collegian, Oct. 8]. Turn off Rush Limbaugh, Mr. Petropoulos, and tune into the real world.

I'd like to address the pathetic paragraph on abortion. Mr. Petropoulos informs us that "abortion is legal now and always will be." Who are you kidding? On June 29, 1992, our Supreme Court ruled in Planned Parenthood of Pennsylvania vs. Casey and virtually gutted Roe vs. Wade. At the same time, the Court also voted on whether or not to overturn Roe vs. Wade. It was held intact by a 5 to 4 vote: a one vote margin. Four Justices clearly stated their desire and intention to destroy a woman's right to choose. As Justice Blackmun wrote, "I fear for the darkness as four Justices await the single vote necessary to extinguish the light." Justice Blackmun is nearing retirement age, and who can forget the last Bush appointee and newest Justice? Thomas and his boys can't wait to revoke a woman's right to choose. His replacement will be another youngish, conservative little-known Justice like Souter and Thomas. Under another four Bush years, abortion will be made illegal, or restricted so much that it might as well be.

UMass Greeks ready to float into homecoming

By CHRISTINA THORPE
Collegian Correspondent

The trees are turning, walks to classes are getting colder, the football team is playing and the University of Massachusetts Greeks are decorating floats.

Homecoming is here.

Arleigh Kennedy, a senior political science major, is the vice-president of activities for the Panhellenic Council. She emphasized the importance of alumni in this weekend's scheduled Homecoming activities.

"Homecoming is a special time for Greeks," said Kennedy. Because of Homecoming, "alumni always have a place to come back to and see the people they know."

The theme of this year's Homecoming is "Greeks through Time." There is a total of seven floats each representing a different decade in history. Some float themes include the "Wild West," "Ancient Greece," "The Stone Age" and "the Future."

The groupings for Homecoming consist of several different chapters — both fraternities and sororities — on each float.

Kristin Fletcher, a sophomore psychology major and sister of Sigma Delta Tau, said she looks forward to her first Homecoming as a Greek.

"Homecoming will be a great opportunity to meet alumni and members of Alpha Chi Rho and Phi Sigma Kappa, whom we are paired with," said Fletcher. "Our theme is the '50s and building the float should be a lot of fun."

Kennedy also said that the UMass Marching Band will be participating in the Homecoming parade. It is a possibility that the University police will also be marching.

At 11:30 a.m. this Saturday, the parade of floats will leave Lot 34 (Visitor's Center) and proceed up Massachusetts Avenue to North Pleasant Street. The procession will travel the length of Fearing Street, turn on University Drive and conclude at Dallas Mall in front of the football stadium.

The football game is scheduled to begin at 1 p.m., and tailgating will be allowed before the game.

Kids lose extra pounds

Study links walking to cholesterol drop

Kids don't have to work out to the max to reduce their cholesterol and body fat levels. University of Massachusetts researchers say low-intensity physical activity, such as walking, does the trick.

The researchers tracked a dozen sixth-graders from Fort River Elementary School in Amherst while they trained to walk the Boston Marathon course last April. They found that the children's cholesterol and fat levels decreased, while their aerobic capacity and body weight increased slightly.

In all, 32 youngsters trained for three months, walking a total of 220 miles. At the peak of their training, they were walking 27 miles a week. The youngsters walked the entire 26-mile, 385-yard Boston Marathon course in two days, starting April 20, the day of the marathon, and finishing the next day.

Frank Rife, associate professor of exercise science, conducted cholesterol tests on their children. "It was very clear that as they increased their training, their cholesterol levels dropped," says Rife.

"We also noticed that if they stopped their training for four or five days because of injuries or holidays, their cholesterol levels reversed themselves and went up," says Rife. "But when they resumed their training, their cholesterol dropped again."

This suggests, Rife says, that physical activity does not have to be intense to produce health benefits, but should be done on a regular basis.

Noting that the children's training was of low intensity and long duration rather than high intensity, Patty Freedson, associate professor of exercise science, says researchers did not expect to see significant increases in aerobic capacity and, in fact, saw only a small increase.

But she says the children's reduced body fat levels may indicate that physical activity does not have to be intense to reduce body fat levels.

As for the increase in the children's body weight, Freedson says its possible that walking increases lean mass, resulting in improved muscle tone.

Ex-hostages lodge suit against Iran

NORRISTOWN, Pa. (AP) — Former hostages Joseph Cicippio and David Jacobsen today announced a lawsuit seeking $600 million of Iran's frozen assets on grounds its government sponsored "commercial terrorism."

The civil suit was to be filed today in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C., their lawyers said.

Cicippio and Jacobsen said today that if they were successful, they would share any proceeds with fellow hostages and families of slain hostages.

"This isn't anything we want for ourselves, but for all the hostages, Cicippio said at a news conference in Norristown, his family's longtime hometown. "We have to let Iran know that this has to hurt in their own pocketbook."

Jacobsen, by phone from California, said the ex-hostages' action "is not one of vengeance. . . but we have to have a commitment to justice."

Jacobsen is 51, Cicippio is 62 and neither has a job.

"Freedom has brought another form of bondage for the hostages," Jacobsen said.

ernment Association, says she thinks the law is not working and is selectively enforced by police.

"It's grossly unfair," said Wood. "Students are denied licenses randomly without any real criteria. And I know a lot of people who have keg parties without licenses.

"It's allowing the town to levy heavy fines," said Wood. "There aren't fewer parties. The whole punishment as a deterrent method doesn't work," she said. "There needs to be different ways. I haven't heard of people not buying a keg because of the law."

Wood suggested the town of Amherst is even pushing the drinking problem into other communities, where students can drink from a keg without a license. She also questioned the need for police to look back to see if the applicant has a criminal record.

"It's absurd. The whole thing doesn't make sense," said Wood.

Senior history major Mark Delcore, 21, doesn't think the law is going to stop students from drinking.

"There's ways around it. Everybody's going to drink anyway," said Delcore. "It sucks. We work all week and we just want to relax on the weekend. They're trying to keep students from blowing off steam."

Scott Forbes, owner of Scott's Liquors in Amherst, said he doesn't find the law effective.

"The person who has the large party is not going to get a license anyway," said Forbes. "It's supposed to promote sensible drinking, which is important, but I don't think the answer is a keg license."

"It seems to be working quite well," said Amherst Town Manager Laurie Benoit. "We're trying to raise student awareness about the liability. The person who purchases the keg is legally responsible if anyone is injured."

Facing charges for violating the keg law, junior history major Chris Jarvis, 20, said he feels the keg law goes too far.

"It's targeted to alienate the student population from the community," said Jarvis, who recalled coming to UMass in 1986 when his friend had a keg party in his residence hall balcony.

Obtaining a license

Maia said it's easy to obtain a license and doesn't understand why people think it's difficult.

"We try to make it as easy as we can," said Maia, who added that only a few people have been denied a license.

Applicants, who must be 21 years or older, need to go to the Amherst Police station for an orientation on the bylaw.

The police consider the following factors before giving their recommendations to the town manager, who has the authority to award the licenses.

• Does the applicant have a criminal record?

• Does the applicant have a record of alcohol-related convictions, arrests or complaints?

• Is there reason to believe beer will be sold?

• What controls will be established to prevent consumption by underage persons?

• Is there a record of alcohol-related complaints under present occupancy at the site of the event?

• Is the size of the site, its parking and sanitary facilities adequate?

If an application is denied, it may be appealed to the Select Board.

"I don't like it," said Phil Delcore, 21, a microbiology major. "There doesn't seem to be that big of a problem. It's not necessary."

excuse for his error. "The bicycle club shouldn't rely on the SAO to give them their account information. This just shows the club has poor fiscal sense," Rose said.

Laurent said the club plans to show a film early next spring and is also going to start collecting dues from its 30 members to raise money.

Laurent said because the bicycle club's loan of $8,963 was not approved, the club is still undecided as to whether it will host its annual spring race weekend.

"This race is always well-attended and it has become a tradition at UMass," said Laurent. He said everyone from the Eastern Collegiate Cycling Federation, which consists of 76 schools from the Northeast, is able to participate in the race after paying a $21 fee.

Laurent said the club could possibly make a higher income in light of the fact that last year's event drew 540 participants.

"I don't know what will happen to the club now," he said.

Thieves couldn't wait to get Madonna's Sex

WALTHAM, Mass. (AP) — Madonna's new book "Sex" goes on sale next week, but some thieves couldn't wait and pilfered 1,365 copies from a trailer.

The trailer had been parked outside the Little Brown & Co. distribution center in Waltham, about 15 miles west of Boston. An official at Warner Books, which published the volume, said no other thefts had been reported.

"I can't even imagine what they (the thieves) would do with them," Warner publicity director Ellen Herrick told the Middlesex News in Framingham.

The $49.95 volume spurred controversy last week in France, where the government threatened to censor the book, which displays the pop star's sexual fantasies in words and pictures. The book is scheduled for release worldwide next Wednesday.

Police say the culprits broke into the trailer some time between 8 p.m. last Thursday and Monday afternoon. Detective Cap. Richard Shannon said the thieves replaced a padlock on the trailer to cover up the theft.

■ Hanson

"The largest growing group in the country is single mothers with a child living below the poverty level. And these people need to be represented," said Hanson. "Bush doesn't represent them."

Hanson worked this summer with Hillary Clinton and Tipper Gore at a convention in Washington D.C. on issues of a women's choice regarding abortion. Hanson is pro-choice.

"It's none of the government's business whether people want children or not," said Hanson, who said she believes the whole movement to protect women's choice is protecting women's rights.

"We've helped in particular to get the message that the government should stay out of the bedroom," Hanson said.

After meeting with Clinton and Gore in person, Hanson said she was much more impressed than she had been by seeing them through the media.

"Hillary is extremely smart, and very sharp," said Hanson. She added that Gore has a lot of integrity and "she's smarter than I thought she was." Hanson said she wasn't impressed by was how "[Gore's] whole life is supporting her husband."

Hanson said one of the most frustrating things for her so far is how unaccepting society is of Hillary Clinton.

"When you have a really dynamic and intelligent woman like Hillary, it's sad that society can't accept her," said Hanson. "I think it's unfortunate that her brilliance has been stifled because she is too threatening to many people."

the sign-up and health forms, post a sign-up sheet outside their rooms, and formulate a roster that way."

No sport too small

Garcia said even with the considerable number of sports offered through intramurals, some students are disgruntled at what isn't offered. The one sport most often mentioned is floor hockey.

"Lots of people ask for floor hockey, but our situation is such that we don't really have a place to play it," she said. "Upstairs in the gym, the floor is pretty beat up, so adding floor hockey wouldn't really help the situation."

This doesn't mean, however, that suggestions fall on deaf ears.

"Coolidge [residence hall] formed seven softball teams, and they wanted to play each other, so we set it up," Garcia said. "We're open to suggestions, but two people cannot make up a whole floor hockey league. You and your girlfriend won't cut it."

'Only pay it once'

Wright and Garcia estimated the intramurals Office has been in operation since 1961 or 1962, and they said that contrary to popular belief, intramural activities are not funded by the athletic fee on students' bi-annual tuition bill.

"We are funded through the General Recreation and Intramural Trust Fund, which is only paid by incoming freshmen and transfer students," Garcia said. "You only pay it once, and it covers you for however many semesters you stay here.

"Whether you graduate in eight semesters or 20, you are still covered after paying the fee that one time," she said.

Garcia estimated that approximately 50 percent of male undergraduates, 20 percent of female undergraduates and five percent of graduates and faculty take part in intramural activities. But Wright believes these numbers could be higher still if his office was given greater access to media outlets.

"I think the Collegian is our best avenue to reach people," he said. "But information is passed about intramurals mostly by word of mouth, because we can't get any publicity from your paper."

Wright said he hopes the campus media will increase coverage of intramural activities so undergraduates won't be denied an opportunity to meet others and have fun simply because they didn't know about it.

"I think it's critical that we let new students know that, hey, we have an intramural program here," he said. "We want students to step up and stop by 215 Boyden so they know we exist and they see what we have to offer."

neering, said he is making a conscious effort to understand how he was taught to have prejudices and is trying to re-educate himself.

"I am praying that God will smash the darkness that is permeating this campus, so that His light will shine," Morrison said.

Morrison also said he believes that praying makes a big difference.

Kristine Dodson, a exchange student from Oregon State University, says she believes students have a misperception that Christians are all White and that Christianity excludes other races.

"We want all students to feel welcome and not think it's an all 'White' thing," Dodson said.

Angel Grant, an undergraduate, says she came to the meeting to pray for peace and healing on this campus.

"God is the only person that can get things done," said Grant.

Pagan said God is important to those students who are in need.

"It's important to pray, it opens the door to heaven, and God listens," Pagan said.

Pagan also appealed to God to help this campus and bring healing to those affected by the racial incidents.

The Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship is open to all students and meets every Friday at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center. The evening program consists of bible-study, fellowship and prayer. It attempts to provide a non-threatening social and educational environment for students.

"Students need to know that God's love is constant and never changing," Dodson said.

If any of you took that thing about the metal file and the teeth seriously yesterday, the Collegian would like to apologise sincerely. The same goes for anyone who read that 'stats is fun' stuff. (Just kidding.)

the opener instead of Cone.

Guzman stopped Oakland on one run and five hits for seven innings. This is his first full season in the majors.

Guzman was on the club that lost last year's playoffs to the Minnesota Twins in five games.

The loss ended the AL West's domination in the playoffs. Oakland and Minnesota had combined to win five straight pennants since Boston won it in 1986.

The game got off to an ominous start for Oakland when Devon White opened the first inning with a lazy fly to shallow left field that Rickey Henderson dropped for a two-base error, his third of the series and fifth in his playoff career. No other outfielder has more than two.

One out later, up came Carter and hit a drive that barely made it over 121.9-meter mark (400 feet) in center field.

office of the A-10 took place concerning Sunday's game and its outcome. According to A-10 rep Bob Steitz, there was "no formal protest filed by UMass," but there was concern about the postponing of the contest.

Therefore, the decision was that the game would resume at a later date, Friday, Oct. 30, at George Washington, with UMass leading 2-1. This changes things for the Minutemen, who will have to wait over two weeks to complete their A-10 regular season.

It would have ended tomorrow at Garber Field against St. Joseph's University, but now UMass will have to play four non-conference affairs before they once again step foot on the field to continue the game with the Colonials.

"We can't worry about the game with GW for awhile now. A win against St. Joe's on Friday is a must for us," said Koch. "We'll have to take one step at a time."

With their opening night, overtime victory the Bruins clinched a playoff spot. Only two slots remain open.

• The day this space starts off with a hockey piece is the day the Red Sox start talking about trading Roger Clemens.

• When the game's close and the tension builds, there is no one in the same league as Sean McDonough. The guy can do any sport with great flare, but it's baseball where he's a true standout.

• A chopper on Astroturf is far different from a chopper on natural grass. It's sort of like the difference between those naturally grown, ten-pound pumpkins and the steroid-fed, 700-pound monstrosities.

• The intensity of the baseball playoffs is right up there with March Madness and the NFL playoffs.

• The raging debate in Montague this past week focused on whether one man can dominate a baseball game. What about hoops? Yes on the latter, no on the former. Watch Eric Lindros prove the point in hockey — he'll be running the show for the next ten years.

Wait a minute, is that the second hockey reference of the week? That could fill the quota for the year.

Javier Gonzalez receives the Collegian Athlete of the Week

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

As a freshman on the University of Massachusetts water polo team last year, Javier Gonzalez made a successful debut, finishing with 29 goals and 23 steals, ranking third on the team in both categories. He compiled these numbers in 82 quarters of play.

This year the native of San Piedras, Puerto Rico has already pumped in 47 goals and collected 20 steals. The goals lead the 16-1, 14th-ranked Minutemen, and the steals are second best on the squad.

The catch is that he has posted them in only 54 quarters.

The reasons for this scoring burst are many. Gonzalez attributes it to this year's increased playing time. At the beginning of last season he was back home playing for the Puerto Rico Junior National Team, so he joined the already formed UMass squad two weekends late.

"I came to a new school, a different country and a new style of playing," he said, "so it took me a while to get into it."

After a year of getting used to his new environment, Gonzalez feels much more in tune with not only his new team, but his school life as a whole.

"The team is more united this year," he said. "We're definitely more of a team than last year. Last year we had very good players but we never really got into it as a team. There's a big difference this year."

Coach Russ Yarworth said the reasons for Gonzalez' scoring are two-fold: the second year of Junior national play, in which Javier had to grow mentally and physically, and the new offense Yarworth implemented.

"I think it's more that he got another year of experience and feels more comfortable with the team," he said. "Last year was his first year as a bilingual student and it can be overwhelming. He's also a year older and a year smarter.

"The change in the offense has kind of emphasized the things that make his part of the game more important," Yarworth said. "One of the things the team has realized is that they have to get the ball to Javier more often."

"He puts the ball in the net, but he wouldn't do it if the rest of the team wasn't playing defense and the structured offense to get him the ball in the right place," Yarworth said.

"The end result is that he has 47 goals, but those are 47 goals that the team has scored. They know where he is going to be. If he gets the ball where he wants it, there's a good chance it's going in the net. That's team water polo."

Gonzalez said in the position he plays now it is his "job" to score, but he is also aware of the old sports adage, "offense wins games, but defense wins championships."

"I love to play both ends of the pool," he said. "I love to play defense because it's harder work than offense. Defense is the key to the game. If you don't let the other team score, they're not going to win."

Gonzalez is quick with his swimming and his hands, and his ability to anticipate steals often produce one-on-none or two-on-one counterattacks that usually produce easy goals.

"Defensively he's one of our better players," Yarworth said. "He plays the 'drop gap' really well because he anticipates where the ball is going to go and comes from the blind side really well."

Men's soccer controversy solved

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

What a long, strange trip it was for the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team. The players and their coaches were left in the midst of controversy as they returned home from Washington D.C. to Amherst last Monday.

The Minutemen had many things on their collective mind Sunday when they entered the game against Atlantic 10 foe George Washington. UMass was coming off a tough defeat in overtime at the hands of West Virginia in a key conference game, which further prolonged the slump the team started at the end of September against Providence.

However, despite losing non-conference games to the Friars, Dartmouth and Northeastern, Sam Koch's team realized that a win over the Colonials combined with a possible upcoming win on Friday against perennial A-10 doormat St. Joseph's would clinch a tie for the regular season conference title with Rutgers University, assuring UMass of a spot in the A-10 Championships.

Enough said for motivation.

The aforementioned controversy took place 20 minutes into the second half in the game between UMass and GW. With the Minutemen leading 2-1, the skies opened up, and head referee Rudy Beckman ruled that the field was not in playable conditions, consequently stopping play at that point.

At the time, it appeared the game would be continued after a brief delay, but the Colonials soon departed the field, leaving UMass upset and in dismay. The team was left with questions, and after the long journey home, the feelings were the same.

"There is no doubt we were disappointed. We were playing well, and controlling the tempo of the game," said Koch.

On Tuesday, a conference call between representatives of the parties involved, UMass and GW, and the Field hockey defeats Dartmouth, 2-0

Freshman scores two goals to lift Minutewomen to victory

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The official slogan of the University of Massachusetts field hockey team is "Roll UMass," but this year's version should probably be "No letdown."

The number four team in the country continued to dominate on the scoreboard and the playing field, stomping the Big Green Wednesday in Hanover, N.H., by a 2-0 score.

The Minutewomen raised their record to 12-1 by stifling any semblance of a Dartmouth attack on defense and letting newcomer Ainslee Press do all of the scoring on offense. Press scored at 23:18 on a penalty corner when Holly Hockenbrock inbounded the ball over to Jenn Salisbury, who set Press up for the 1-0 lead.

Press' addition on the UMass penalty corner has led to a plethora of goals and has turned a once impotent attack into one of the feared offenses in the Northeast.

Press scored again just before halftime, at 5:14 to be exact, on a slapshot from outside the circle. The senior transfer student from Mississuaga, Canada raised her team leading goal total to 15.

The Minutewomen outshot Dartmouth 15-5 and allowed the Big Green only one penalty corner while acheiving 10 themselves. UMass goalie Philippa Scott posted her second shutout in a row and eighth overall, making four saves. On the other side of the field, Dartmouth's Lauren Demski had to make 10 saves against the tough UMass offense.

Every forward got into the act for Massachusetts, as Press, Tara Jelley, Kathy Phelan, Colleen Duffy, Joy Blenis, Hockenbrock and Salisbury all got shots off, a true indication of the UMass ball distribution.

The Minutewomen refused to let down against a noticeably weaker team, which says a lot about the intestinal fortitude of the team. The UMass squad took yesterday's road game in stride, and the fact that they won going away says a lot.

It means they are taking each and every team they face seriously, while at the same time realizing their talent. The whole team has preached "one game at a time," and after the win against Dartmouth, there is now one less team standing in their path.

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN
Kathy Phelan and the University of Massachusetts field hockey team came back from Hanover, New Hampshire last night with a 2-0 victory over Dartmouth.

Blue Jays gain spot in Series

By BEN WALKER
Associated Press

TORONTO — The Toronto Blue Jays finally learned how to win in October and took the World Series out of the United States for the first time by beating the Oakland Athletics 9-2 Wednesday to win the AL playoffs.

Juan Guzman did what Jack Morris and David Cone could not do, winning on three days' rest, to wrap up Game Six. Joe Carter and Candy Maldanado made Guzman's second victory of the series easier with home runs that put Toronto ahead 6-0 after three innings.

Roberto Alomar capped the series off with an RBI single in the eighth. He was 11 for 26 in the series, tying the record for hits in an AL playoff.

After Ruben Sierra flied out to Maldonado in left for the final out, fireworks exploded beneath the closed lid of the SkyDome and the Blue Jays mobbed each other on the field as fans went wild.

By avoiding a seventh game, the Blue Jays will be able to set up its rotation any way it wants for the World Series. Morris will likely start

Sonic Youth

By ERIC T. NELSON
Collegian Correspondent

Sonic Youth are going to kick your ass. The adjective "sonic" in their name is not an idle threat. These guys are loud. As hell. From crunching guitar rhythms to screaming feedback riding on waves of writhing ecstasy, Sonic Youth does it all. The voice of a disillusioned generation of thrashers, their tour de force marches into Amherst next week.

Sonic Youth occupy the hearts and minds of the kids of America. Thurston Moore's wailing melodies dig trenches into your brain, preparing to weather out the storm. Alternately screeching like a banshee and weaving his sweet vocals into the sometimes hard to find melodies of the band, Thurston is an integral part of the glue that holds Sonic Youth together.

The flailing bass and throaty vocals of Kim Gordon make your bones ache with a longing and light up with an emotion that few other women in rock seem to achieve. She is a logical predecessor to such rebel female rockers as Joni Mitchell and Chryssie Hynde.

Guitar player and (sometimes) singer Lee Ranaldo and drummer Steve Shelley round out the band. Sonic Youth were formed during the rush of noise bands in New York City's early 80's music scene. Unlike most of the other groups conceived in this era, Sonic Youth have managed to stick together, becoming increasingly more fine-tuned ever since.

The group began their eardrum-splitting assault on the music world with their self-titled, self-produced 1981 debut. This was followed by "Confusion is Sex," at which time, Thurston described the group's music as, "like having sex with the insane."

Sonic Youth were once again thrust into the limelight with 1988's "The Whitey Album," for which they credited the recording to Ciccone Youth, in a poke of fun at Madonna (whose last name happens to be Ciccone). They released a single off the album called "Into the Groove(y)," further bashing the material girl.

1988's "Daydream Nation," and its single, "Teenage Riot" secured Sonic Youth's place as gods of alternative music and proved that they were a force to be reckoned with. The single shot to #1 on the alternative charts and

Madman: original & enjoyable comics mayhem

By KIP MANLEY
Collegian Staff

Madman
Michael Dalton Allred
Tundra Publishing Limited

Rumor has it — I didn't get a chance to see for myself, but my sources are (as usual) impeccable — that at this year's Comic Relief Robin Williams was spotted wearing a Madman T-shirt. Which is a sure sign of something — I just have no idea what. Still, it couldn't happen to a nicer comic. To Madman, I mean. Not Robin Williams.

Nice is definitely the word here, and I mean it in the best possible sense. "Pleasing, agreeable; also: well-executed; well-bred; virtuous, respectable," as the Merriam-Webster Dictionary defines it. Madman is all of these, as well as being original and highly enjoyable.

Michael Allred tells us the story of an unnamed protagonist who has forgotten who he is, who knows only that he wears a slightly silly costume and that occasionally, when he touches people, he can read their minds — though this makes him dance the Curley Shuffle when it takes effect. He also knows that the only person who could have answered any questions he might have about himself is dead.

And so he departs on a quest to bring his mentor back to life. He has quite a few adventures along the way, with mad scientists of all types and their henchmen fair and foul, with a small town mayor and decomposing zombies, with the girl of his dreams and ultimately, with his past.

The total effect is that of a demented magical-realist B-movie from the '50s, as befits the comic's peculiar plot twists. The characters are drawn as if cast from an endless stream of extras from B-movies and '60s TV shows, lumps, warts and all, though the comic itself seems to take place in some amorphous analog of the present day, where towns have names like Snap City and Buzztown and Big Brother Security watches the skies.

A host of telling details adds to this comic's take on retro, from the cars to the fashions to a deserted drive-in theater which was once showing a movie entitled The Brain That Wouldn't Die to the comic's logo itself, which is an adaptation of the classic Mad Magazine logo from the '50s.

Though the comic has its violent moments, and concludes with a lengthy action sequence — which features a surprisingly straight reiteration of a classic Warner Brothers cartoon gag — Madman never descends to becoming merely an action comic.

There are quiet moments, where Our Hero ponders the significance of his actions, or just thinks those stupidly profound thoughts we all find ourselves thinking. And Allred never forgets that this is a story about a quest for identity, and through that, self-esteem.

These three issues form their own self-contained story, though they draw on material presented in issues of Allred's earlier comic, Graphik Musik.

Each issue can also stand on its own, though reading them all together is by far preferable. This isn't the end for Madman, though. Allred promises more issues to come, dealing not just with our newly empowered hero, but the strange and wondrous world he moves through.

Good news indeed.

SUNDAY

Native Americans in cinema, part II

By DANIEL A. BROWN
Special to the Collegian

This is the second of a three-part story discussing how Native American people have been portrayed in the contemporary American cinema.

A Man Called Horse (1969) — Eliot Silverstein, director. Richard Harris. Summary: In the 1830's an English nobleman is captured and enslaved by the Lakota. He slowly earns their trust, participates in their rituals and fights to defend them. The two sequels follow his return from Europe to reunite with the Sioux and the exploits of his son.

Plus: For mainstream moviegoers, this was their cinematic introduction to a sympathetic portrayal of Native Americans. There are a few memorable scenes here, especially the Sun Dance ritual in Return of a Man Called Horse (1976).

Minus: The plots are mired in your basic Hollywood package of gratuitous violence. Somewhat exploitative, especially the dreadful Triumphs of a Man Called Horse (1983) which featured starlets in buckskin bikinis! Several ethnological miscues such as the forest of burial scaffolds on the the village edge.

Verdict: Not necessary to watch, especially with Dances With Wolves on video.

Soldier Blue (1970) — Ralph Nelson, director. Peter Strauss, Candice Bergen. Rated (R). Summary: Fictional western adventure derived from the infamous Sand Creek Massacre that took place in Colorado in 1864. In one of the most sordid events in American history, a unit of Colorado militia (led by a former Methodist minister) surrounded and destroyed a Cheyenne village camping peacefully under an American flag. Several hundred women and children were murdered and subsequently mutilated. The My Lai of the Indian Wars.

Plus: Truer to history in that it is the Indians who are massacred this time.

Minus: Considering the potential subject matter, the plot and acting are uniformly awful. The Indians are still treated as faceless savages and the massacre scene has all the gravity of a fraternity toga party.

Verdict: Read Bury My Heart at Wounded Knee or see Little Big Man (below).

Little Big Man (1971) — Arthur Penn, director. Dustin Hoffman, Chief Dan George, Faye Dunaway. (PG) Summary: From the story by Thomas Berger. The fictional saga of 121 year-old Jack Crabb who spends his life ricocheting between the Cheyenne, his adoptive people (who name him "Little Big Man") and the Americans, his people by blood. As the West is "won," the Cheyenne fight bravely, but futilely against extinction. Climaxes with Custer at Little Big Horn.

Plus: In my opinion, the true "breakthrough" film about Native Americans which portrays them as real people. Chief Dan George gives and Oscar-level performance that has yet to be equalled. His choice of words tell more about the Plains Indians' world view that anything yet set to celluloid. The diversity of individuals within the Cheyenne is also well presented.

Drawing from an actual event, the most harrowing scene in this movie is the 1869 "Battle" of the Washita, where Custer attacked a peaceful Cheyenne village populated by the same unlucky survivors of Sand Creek! This is the movie Soldier Blue could have been. Hoffman is excellent as he dances through a lifetime identity crisis with conviction and confusion.

Minus: Not as many Native American performers as could be possible and some of the Cheyenne women have hippie names like "Sunshine." The overlong plot could have done without some silly sequences that lower the integrity of the story.

Verdict: Still, a must-see. A good rainy afternoon video.

Mr. Lupo says new Columbus flick looks great & works better than a sedative

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Zzzzzzzz. 1492: Conquest of Paradise is like a long, drawn-out boring dream. All of the people who want to see Columbus exhumed and flogged, don't worry. Hollywood has spent roughly $90 million on two crappy Columbus biopics. And these flops hit them where it counts: the pocketbook.

The first was the confused Christopher Columbus: The Discovery, with Marlon Brando slothing his way to the bank in a glorified walk-on and unknown George Correface as the 'hero.' That film's problem (despite being cheesy from the fade-in) was it tried having it both ways. Columbus was a hero, then a villain, then a hero. It became a problem trying to figure out what this guy was from scene to scene.

This 1492 came with less baggage, and with Gerard Depardieu as Chris, Sigourney Weaver as Queen Isabella and Ridley Scott (Blade Runner) as director. 1492 is gorgeous to look at, it's by far one of the best looking films of the year. Once you get by the visuals (and it's hard to do), 1492 reveals itself as a stilted and dull movie...a plain bore.

Le French actor avec a big nose Gerard Depardieu brings a certain weight and presence to 1492. His Columbus was mostly misunderstood, a man who dared to dream (yuck) of a New World across the sea.

He convinces a well-dressed Queen Isabella (Weaver, looking fabulous with hair) to grant him ships but he is unaware the queen's advisors are really pulling the strings. During what looks like a swift voyage across the ocean, the mists part on cue (vintage Scott at work) and reveal a lush paradise.

Columbus makes friends with the natives and, in a voice over he says that he wants to convert the natives to Christianity only if they want to. What a nice guy. In the second voyage, we are given the white man's scapegoat (someone else to blame), a Spanish nobleman named De Moxica (Michael Wincott, Alan Rickman's henchman in Robin Hood), who it would seem, was the real villain.

Greedy white men, led by De Moxica (but excluding our buddy Chris) start the abuse, exploitation and eventual war. In a spellbinding sequence, a marvelous storm overtakes the islands. A cross Columbus put up is struck by lightning, setting it ablaze. All inferences to the wrath of God, my friends, are wholly intended.

1492 pretty much validates Columbus as a man manipulated by enemies both on the islands and abroad. So when we see Chris at the end, aged (although no one else has seemed to grow older) and without credit for 'discovering' the New World, we are supposed to feel sorry for him. After spending two and a half hours with this guy, I felt sympathy, mainly because the filmmakers made a film about Columbus that seemed to last as long as his life.

1492 is another triumph for Ridley Scott in visual theatrics. But once again eye-candy is being emphasized over the story. It made me wonder if his best films, Alien and Thelma & Louise were just accidental collisions with rich visuals and strong narratives. Great visuals do not make a good film, they make good music videos.

Depardieu displays some of the instincts that make him such a great actor. Excusing the goofy Green Card, Depardieu has done some amazing work, most recently as Cyrano de Bergerac. Too bad the blazing sunsets and carefully lit castles continually upstage him.

1492 is entitled to its own interpretation of the events, but the facts surrounding the real Columbus seem in very short supply. This film doesn't shed any more light on Columbus, rather it serves up the old myth with a dash of conspiracy thrown it. This Conquest of Paradise is in vain; 1492 is beautiful looking, but as interesting as Crystal Gayle's hair...and just about as long.

Grade: C-

In theatres now:

Hero: Though a minor misstep for my favorite director Stephen Frears, this contemporary comedy/satire is classy and funny. However, it's a little too big for its britches, never quite becoming what it wants to be. Dustin Hoffman, Geena Davis and Andy Garcia give great performances, though the latter couple have underwritten roles. Better than your average comedy. (B)

Last of the Mohicans: This adventure skips any assemblance of character and goes straight for the jugular. Miami Vice creator Michael Mann doesn't provide any characters — he's to busy concocting enticing visuals. The now famous clifftop climax is totally unmotivated and the romance is painfully unbelievable. Good fight sequences, great waterfalls, but this overrated hit is shallow, flashy filmmaking. (B-)

Sea of Hats will sing you no 'happy love songs'

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

What does local band Sea of Hats have in common with greats Negative Land, The Replacements, Frank Sinatra, Eric Clapton, Lou Reed, The Who, and The Beatles? Not a thing, but you may still find yourself humming their tunes in the shower and wondering who these guys are and what they are doing in your tub.

It has not even been a year that they have been jamming together, but Sea of Hats asserts that these "three young lads with a burning dream" will forever change your idea of music after their performance at Amherst College Saturday.

"We do mostly pop/rock with a heavy emphasis on the irony of life, coupled with the fact that none of us are very good." offered Matt Walker, sophomore Philosophy major at Amherst and drummer.

Jesse Fuchs, junior bass player and sometime English major asserted that the band's music is primarily "generic rock" of "Smithereen loudness" and the kind of simple stuff that keeps the mood light and the crowd happy.

Fuchs also explained that the band draws from personal experience to be "subtle destroyers of hypocrisy." Their music, alleged to be somewhat similar to that of Too Much Joy, is a response to the sometimes heavy political tuneage on the airwaves and in the record shops today. The band points out that often, such social/political jargon interferes with the entertainment quality of the music.

"Why write a song from your own point of view?" questioned Fuchs. "I mean, who is against the rainforest?" he quipped.

The band borrows the name of a book of poetry by Japanese poet Okunari Tatsu, who has since become a mascot of sorts for the group.

Their lineup on Saturday night will include songs written since the band's formation last February, with a conscious lack of "happy love songs." Most tunes are short and sweet, and are sure to make you wonder how the band will achieve their longtime dream of a concert in smell-o-vision, with a scratch-and-sniff sticker for each song. With tracks like "Cockroaches, twinkies, and Jethro Tull," one wonders.

Special guest Freudloaf will open Saturday. This hardcore band out of WAMH/Amherst College will feature their unique "Ironlung" style. Also, a special performance by Professor Douglass of LJST at AC will rock in "Municipal Dropout." And you thought Amherst College was stuffy...

In addition to the rockin' professor, John Rudolph, sophomore Classics and Music major will give a new meaning to lead vocals and guitar. The Manhattan native may even treat the audience to a Sheena Easton hit.

The band has a six-song album on the Boo Radleys' dreams of rock and roll come true

By LAUREN BECKHAM
Special to the Collegian

Martin Carr likes his job.

Playing lead guitar with the increasingly popular Boo Radleys, a pop/rock/alternative English band doesn't sound so bad, does it?

The composer and lyricist Carr, a founding member of the band — also known as the "Boos" as their fans have dubbed them — gave an inside peek into the makings of a hit musical group.

"I guess it all started when Sice (on lead vocals) and I were about ten. We'd run home from school in Liverpool, go down to the basement of my house and pretend we were in a band. We'd practice doing interviews, rehearsing, pushing away crazed fans, you know, a basic day in a band's life. Well, we did that for about eight years until we decided it would be a good idea to learn how to sing and play an instrument."

Sice and Carr learned. After recruiting bass player Tim Brown and drummer Steve Hewitt (replaced by Rob Cieka in 1991), The Boo Radleys hit the club scene.

"We started locally, but realized that in order to get exposure we would have to go to London. It cost us more to get to London than we made playing the gigs, so playing wasn't very lucrative, but it was worth it."

The Boos persevered, got 'exposed' and released a mini-LP called "Ichibod and I" on a small local label. Their debut received rave reviews and led to a series of EP's only released in the United Kingdom, Kaleidoscope, Every Heaven and Boo Up.

After signing with Columbia Records, the Boo Radleys released their first full-length album, "Everything's Alright Forever." The Boos are now working on their second album, scheduled to be released next year. Their music, which is as elusive as the band's namesake — Boo Radley was the imagined boogeyman in the minds of the children in Harper Lee's novel, To Kill A Mockingbird — is a creation born from Carr's composing.

"I guess it all starts when I hear a certain sound on the TV, street, subway or wherever and I go home and play around with the sound on my guitar until I have something I like. Some songs take months to get right, others take only 15 minutes."

Carr is consistently being influenced by other artists, but mainly bands such as The Byrds, The Beatles, Dinosaur Jr. and My Bloody Valentine are the most influential.

"I like Public Enemy a lot, but you

Student Telephone Directory

Distribution of the 1992-93 Student Telephone Directory will begin later this week and take about five work days to complete (so please be patient).

Residence hall students will receive one copy per room with delivery being made through cooperation of the Area Operations Offices. Commuters will receive copies via bulk drop at the Campus Center Concourse following deliveries to residence halls (probably early next week); Staff and Faculty via campus mail.

15,000 copies are printed. It is unlikely that any excess copies will be available following the initial distribution.

The primary purpose of the directory is to provide a listing of residence hall room telephones (prefix 546) whose numbers are not otherwise available through Directory Assistance/ Information.

The directory is printed by an outside contractor at no cost to students or the University.

Corrections of addresses and telephone numbers should be made at the Registrar's Office.

You may note some "unusual" address abbreviations. These are due to a computer problem at the vendor's computer conversion company. For the full name of residence halls see page 7; for Amherst street addresses, page 10. Hopefully, this matter will be rectified by the Spring Supplement (5,000 copies).

FIGHTING MINUTEMEN

AN OPEN LETTER TO UMASS STUDENTS

Dear UMass Students,

I am writing this letter to invite you to our Homecoming game vs. the University of Connecticut, this Saturday afternoon at 1:30 pm.

We have a fine football team. They play an exciting, emotional brand of football, and as a result they are really fun to watch.

We need you to help us win this very important Yankee Conference game. Both UConn and UMass have one conference loss and can not afford another. We are not a dominating team, but we have won three football games because we play with great intensity. Your support Saturday can help us sustain the emotional level that we need in order to win.

We have an outstanding band, an exciting football team, and tailgating is back. Please join us for a great afternoon at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Sincerely,
Mike Hodges
Head Football Coach

Sonic Youth at UMass

■ cover story

the album, a double-length mix of carefully discordant melodies and songs that inextricably work their way into one's head and implant themselves to stay, was a huge hit.

"Goo," their 1990 release, showed the band with a return to their musical roots. Screeching guitar noise and lengthy feedback loops full of distortion dominate the album. The newest Sonic Youth recording, "Dirty," carries their chaotic-yet-melodic version of rawk and roll to its most refined plateau. Thurston, Kim, Lee, and Steve have blasted themselves to new heights as indy rock deities.

The album opens with the intense boom of "100%," a song about ex Black Flag frontman Henry Rollins' best friend, who was shot dead on the street in L.A. — a victim of aimless violence.

Other gems showcased within include "Theresa's Sound World," described by Thurston as, "A dirty thought. An erotic succubus once again foretells the future through a 'flicker' dream." The anthematic "Youth Against Facism" rails against the government and aligns itself with Anita Hill.

"Dirty" is a true classic, From the desperate wailing on "Swimsuit issue" and "Chapel Hill," to the closing sweetness of "Creme Brulee."

Sonic Youth will be espousing their philosophy of "make love and plenty of it, baby!" at the Student Union Ballroom on Monday, October 19 at 9 p.m. Joining them will be their special guests, Cell. The tickets are $13 for UMass students and $16 for all others (in advance). On the day of the show, the cost will be $14 for UMass students and $17 for all others.

The Collegian is looking for a few good photographers.

Candidates go toe to toe in round two

By TOM RAUM
Associated Press

Richmond, Va. (AP) — President George Bush and Bill Clinton argued over taxes and character Thursday night in free flowing debate with Ross Perot. Clinton said he wanted the wealthy to pay their "fair share" in higher taxes, while the president said he was opposed to any tax hikes.

There were few surprises and surely no knockout punches, and little to suggest that the session would boost Bush in his effort to overtake Clinton by Nov. 3rd.

Bush was more aggressive than he had been in Sunday night's first debate, criticizing Clinton for trying to come down on more than one side of an issue.

"You can't turn the White House into the Waffle House," he said.

Clinton replied that he has been "disturbed by the tone and tenor of this campaign. I'm not interested in his character. I'm interested in changing the character of the presidency."

The 90 minute debate at the University of Richmond was held under unprecedented ground rules in which members of a live audience asked questions.

Following Bush's criticism of Clinton, one questioner asked "can't we focus on the issues and programs. . . How can we expect the three of you to meet our needs?"

The questioner suggested that the candidates were steered by protest that the thoughts they uttered were their own, and not drilled into them by aides.

The candidates gave their remedies for the huge federal deficit, and Perot said scathingly that neither Republicans nor Democrats were willing to take blame for the nation's huge debt.

"Somewhere out there is an extraterestrial who's doing this to us," he said.

Rather than standing behind the customary wooden podiums, Bush, Clinton and Perot sat on and were free to move about.

They fielded questions from an audience of 209 independent voters, rather than from journalists. Carole Simpson of ABC News served as moderator for the 90 minute session.

Clinton was the leader in all the polls as he, Bush and Perot took up their positions, and Republicans conceded time was growing short for the president to shake up the race for the White House.

The Arkansas governor was quick to take advantage of the format, moving away from his chair and closer to the audience in responding to the first question.

Perot came out as feisty as ever, punctuating his points with hand gestures and references to the audience.

UM students hold forum, debate used as setting

After about 60 University students laughed, booed, cheered and wildly clapped, as they watched the second presidential debate in Lewis dormitory's television lounge, State Senator Stanley Rosenberg moderated the students' own lively debate. Residential education and the University Democrats co-sponsored the forum.

Students' shouted and clapped when the moderator, Carole Simpson of ABC, posed an educational question to President Bush from a participant in the audience.

"Who would like to begin it? 'The educational president?'" Simpson asked.

Students also cheered, when Clinton said, "I don't want you to read my lips and I sure don't want you to read his."

Responsibilities abound for new Mullins director

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

The William D. Mullins Memorial Arena has taken over c..ven years and $51 million to be completed, but everything is finally coming together for the opening day on January 31, 1993.

The newly appointed executive director of the Mullins Arena Lee Esckilsen, from Ogden Entertainment Services, will have the responsibilty of organizing the schedule of events to be held at the Arena.

"I want to make this the best possible building it can be for the students as well as the community," said Esckilsen, who currently works for Ogden as executive director of the Sioux Falls Arena in South Dakota.

Paul Page, vice-chancellor of administration and finance, said he felt outside management expertise was the best. "We were all impressed with (Esckilsen's) references and felt he was a good person for the job since he was so highly recommended," Page said.

Esckilsen said he was very impressed with the Arena's two Olympic size ice rinks, seven racquetball courts and 30'X60' theater stage. He said the Arena also offers comfortable seating, has 12 concession stands and is easily accessible.

"The arena is gorgeous. The students will be ecstatic when they see it," said Esckilsen, who earned his masters

Campus awaits Mullins' opening

It all began in 1985 when a representative decided The University of Massachusetts lacked an indoor facility of sufficient size for major sports, concerts and exhibitions.

Representative William D. Mullins said he believed a multi-purpose sports and convocation center was essential to the University's continued growth, and thus the idea for the William D. Mullins Memorial Center was born.

"The Arena is the best thing that happened to Western Massachusetts in my lifetime, and I've been around for a long time," said Harold Stoddart, UMass Building Authority member.

The Arena was named after Mullins,

Possible POW evidence

Southeast Asia paddies have letters

By JOHN DIAMOND
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The letters "USA" and "K" etched into a Laotian rice paddy only four years ago could be distress signals from American POWs, according to Senate testimony Thursday.

A top U.S. intelligence official told a Senate committee that the symbols have not been linked to any unaccounted for POW. But lawmakers and other officials involved in the POW search process said the letters were almost certainly manmade and meant to be seen from the air.

As in past hearings of the Senate Select Committee on POW-MIA Affairs, the testimony sparked disagreement among panel members and between senators and witnesses over the possibility that American POWs may be alive in Southeast Asia.

"This may be the only evidence that we find that points to specific men," said Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa.

The committee chairman, Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., warned against encouraging family members of the missing to believe their loved ones are still alive.

"If we pretend to them that something is a symbol when it's not, we are falsely raising hopes," Kerry said.

Duane Andrews, the assistant defense secretary for communications and intelligence, testified that the Defense Intelligence Agency, using highly sophisticated and classified photographic techniques, has analyzed several aerial images as shadows cast by trees or overly optimistic interpretation of markings on buildings.

"It's easy to be misled," Andrews said. "Our photo analysts are trained to report what's on the imagery, not what they'd like to be on the imagery."

In two instances, DIA has concluded that symbols were manmade but has reached no conclusion on what they mean, Andrews said.

—On Jan. 22, 1988, an aerial image was taken of a rice paddy in norther Laos near the village of Sam Jeua as part of a Defense Department POW mission. By the time the photo was analyzed the following December and follow up missions flown, the letters had disappeared. But the photos showed a clearly delineated "USA" symbol carved out of the paddy in letters about 12 feet high and 6 feet wide. Below the "USA" letters was another marking that could be the letter "K", a letter used by Air Force pilots to communicate with rescuers.

—In May and July of 1973, after the signing of the Paris Peace Accords between the United States and North Vietnam, unmanned air reconnaissance craft photographed what appeared to be the numbers "1973" followed by the letters "TH or "TA." the symbols were etched into the ground or grass in central Laos on the Plane of Jans, a contested area during the civil war between U.S. supported Royal Laotian forces and communist guerillas.

Man kills four plus self, objects to child support

WATKINS GLEN, N.Y. (AP) — A gunman complaining about having to pay child support walked into a county office and opened fire Thursday, killing four workers before himself, authorities said.

Nancy Hall, an assistant administrator at Schuyler Hospital in Montour Falls, confirmed that four women were killed in the incident and a man died later in the hospital of a head wound.

The Elmira Star-Gazette reported that the women were workers for the Schuyler County Department of Social Services. The shooting occured in the department's Support Collection Unit, which works to get parents to pay child support.

The man, believed to have been the gunman, died of a self-inflicted wound, the Star-Gazette said.

The paper quoted police sources at the scene as saying a man walked into the office, located in a building adjacent to the county courthouse, complained about having paid child support for a number of years, and started shooting.

There were conflicting reports as to whether there was a standoff, with people in the office held hostage for a time, or whether the shooting happened relatively quickly.

Aid Amherst shelters

Shelter Sunday needs more volunteers

BY KELLY SPANG
Collegian Correspondent

The Friends of the Homeless need volunteers for Shelter Sunday on October 18 to go door-to-door in Amherst asking for donations to benefit local homeless organizations.

"We know in past years we didn't get to knock on every door in town," said Hill Boss, Shelter Sunday Coordinator, "because we ran out of volunteers."

Any kind of community service is always worth the time.

–Fred Smallwood
UMass Senior

In past years, about 100 people volunteered, but Boss estimates that 200 participants are necessary to cover all of Amherst.

"Shelter Sunday is a town supported activity," said Betsy Johnson, Friends' President. The Amherst Board of Selectpersons decides when Shelter Sunday will be held.

"Out of ten doors," Johnson said, "maybe one door will be slammed in your face."

Volunteers go from house to house asking for a dollar donation from residents, but Johnson said people usually give more than a dollar.

The goal is to raise $17,500 to be equally divided between the Amherst Survival Center, the Not Bread Alone Soup Kitchen, Amherst Charitable Fund, and the Grove Street Inn in Northampton.

All of these organizations are in need of financial assistance, especially Grove Street Inn which Boss said is claiming a need of over $40,000 by the end of this year.

Boss also pointed out the irony of budget cuts to homeless shelters and soup kitchens by the state. While the state reduces funding for places such as the Grove Street Inn, the demand for services from these places increases. So these organizations must serve more people with less money.

UMass students generally have not participated in Shelter Sunday in large numbers, Johnson said. "We mainly get isolated students through church organizations," Johnson explained.

In past years, fraternities and sororities have also participated, but Boss said this year none of the houses registered to send volunteers.

Fred Smallwood, a senior management major at UMass, organized a building wide appeal for students to volunteer for Shelter Sunday in Brown (Sylvan). Smallwood said ten students will be participating from his building, but he encourages other UMass students to get involved.

"Any kind of community service is always worth the time," said Smallwood.

Anyone interested in volunteering for Shelter Sunday, the Friends of the Homeless will be meeting on the Amherst Common at 12:30 p.m. to assign areas to volunteers.

New Alliance candidate campaigns in NoHo

Her organization, the New Alliance Party, was formed in 1979 in New York by local activists. Since then the party has grown into a thriving left-wing party. Fulani, who has served as chairwoman of the party since 1985, calls the organization as "a grassroots movement to challenge the bipartisan political monopoly that runs

Turn to FULANI, page 7

Independent presidential candidate Dr. Lenora Fulani will be campaigning in Northampton tomorrow with a series of speeches and other appearances throughout the day.

Fulani will be appearing on the November ballot in Massachusetts and 40 other states under the New Alliance Party, which is presently the second largest independent political party in America.

John Morrison, a Northampton city councilor, organized Fulani's visit after meeting with her in New York City.

Morrison said he first became interested in Fulani and her organization after reading about her campaign in The Nation.

After meeting with Fulani in New York, Morrison said he was "completely won over by her party and its platform," and agreed to help coordinate her campaign in Western Massachusetts.

Dr. Fulani's day in Northampton will begin with a 10:30 a.m. tour of Hampshire Heights followed by an 11:00 a.m. campaign rally at Hampton Gardens.

She will then move on to a book signing at the Greycourt Bookshop on Green Street and will give a speech at Smith College in the Neilson Library.

At 4:30 p.m., Fulani will visit the Grove Street Shelter and hold a second rally there. Mayor Mary Ford of Northampton will also be present.

Dr. Fulani became the first woman and first African American to be named on the ballot on all 50 states in 1988. This year she became the first of all the presidential candidates to receive federal primary matching funds.

Homecoming benefits research

ATG uses NASA equipment to raise AIDS funds

By CHRISTINA THORPE
Collegian Correspondent

This year the spirit of Homecoming is not all fun and games. Alpha Tau Gamma is also making Homecoming one of giving.

ATG is a local fraternity whose members are enrolled in the University's Stockbridge School of Agriculture. As part of the regular Homecoming festivities, ATG has included a very unique philanthropic event which will benefit AIDS research.

Steve Ziolkowski is a junior urban forestry major, President of Alpha Tau Gamma and the Interfraternity Council's Vice President of Activities.

"What we're trying to do is raise money for AIDS research by having people try out this thing called a Gyro," said Zoilkowski. "It's really called a Tri-Axial Orbital Device."

A what?

Doubling as an amusement ride and a physical workout, the Gyro is usually used by NASA in the training of astronauts. It will be available for the public to try at 12:30 p.m. on Saturday, October 17th - directly following the Homecoming Parade.

The fuel used to propel the rider around and around while on the Gyro is provided by the rider himself. When you shift your body weight, your ride ranges from a "relaxing float" to an "exhilarating flight."

With only five minutes on the Gyro, it is possible to receive a full body workout both cardiovascularly and isometrically.

The Gyro is praised as never being boring or repetitous. It would be quite a physical challenge to even try and repeat a routine you were able to do previously on the device.

Will you lose your lunch trying to help ATG raise money for AIDS research?

The answer is no. While you are "flying" the Gyro, it's proven you will not even become dizzy, let alone nauseous.

The Tri-Axial Orbital Device will be on display during the Homecoming Parade while aboard Alpha Tau Gamma's float. Then, if you wish to try the Gyro out for yourself, it will be on the lawn of ATG, 401 North Pleasant Street.

Each ride will be a $3 to $5 dollar donation given to AIDS research.

UMass trustees approve budget

AMHERST (AP) — University of Massachusetts trustees have approved a $1 billion operating budget for the five campus university system.

The spending plan, adopted by the University trustees at a meeting Wednesday on the Amherst campus, is about $20.5 million higher than the $979.5 million spent by the five schools during the last fiscal year. The five campuses had $990.8 million in revenues last year.

This year for the first time the campuses will be allowed to keep the tuition money they collect instead of turning it over to the state's general fund.

State officials have required at least 4 percent of the tuition revenue to be used for maintenance and repair or equipment purchases.

The allotment for the Amherst campus, the largest in the system, totals $376 million, including $42.2 million in tuition. Last year, the campus spent $343.6 million, according to treasurer Stephen Lenhardt.

who died in 1986, because he was dedicated to higher education and was very interested in the UMass sports program. Many of his legislature colleagues, namely former Speaker George Keverian and Senator William Bulger, carried out his plans for the Arena.

Trying to find funding for the construction of the Arena took over three years, but it was eventually provided by a State Capital Outlay and the UMass Building Authority. The Authority issued bonds for $23,855,278 and the state appropriated $25 million.

The bond will be repaid through a $50 per semester fee charged to students beginning in September 1993. Stoddart said the borrowed money is tax exempt.

Paul Page, vice-chancellor of administration and finance, said construction for the Arena began in January, 1991 and in six weeks the contractor will turn the facility over to the University.

Page said the University needs six weeks to get a feel for the building and to test the system because the facility is very complex. "It would be a disaster if in the middle of a hockey game the ice started to melt," he said.

Page said he predicted the Arena would not break even with its expenses after the first year. "There is still a host of unknowns, but over time we will sort out what the market is and how many people the Arena will attract," he said.

"The Arena will offer significant opportunity for student employment," said Page. He said the University, in conjunction with Ogden Entertainment Services, will hire only 11-12 full-time workers and rest of the help will be part-time.

Page said the concession stand contract was awarded to the University Auxiliary Services Division and the merchandise concessions contract was awarded to the Facility Merchandise Incorporated of California.

According to Page, the University will get a percentage of the profit.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers or cartoonists and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

Women of all colors must join hands and break the silence

Women must unite.

Women as a whole are oppressed. We are discriminated against, we are treated as subordinates, we are assaulted, we are harassed, we are raped.

Although you will find women of color are subject to all of these disgraces more than white women, we all suffer as women. Fighting against one another will divide women and make it easier to oppress us. Uniting as women we are stronger as a whole and able to fight abuse and discrimination with more power.

The negative attitudes I find between a majority of white women and women of color are unnecessary. There is no need for us to be against one another. There is a common ground we all hold and it is being women. Our color must not stop us from looking at each other as women, people and adversaries against our common abuse.

Women as a whole need to come together and work as women, as people. We need to discuss how we can improve the community for women. This includes funding of multicultural services and programs at the Everywoman's Center, a place where women of all colors should feel comfortable to go for services, funding of women's sports, more women representing their views in the Collegian, more multicultural staff of women at the University, and more scholarships for all low income women.

Stacy MALONE

Whether we say it out loud or feel it in our hearts, every day we see in the news, in our homes, on our campus, we are women and we are being abused like animals. When a woman is raped, assaulted, harassed or killed all women are violated. Abusers, batterers and rapists do not abuse, batter and rape color; they rape women. Women of all colors.

Mary Kociela, of New England Learning Center for Women in Transition, said when a woman is murdered from domestic violence their shelter and hot lines are flooded with calls from women. The abusers in domestic violence situations use the deaths of battered victims to scare their own victim. They tell the women, "You better watch out or you'll be next."

White women are not the only victims abusers prey on and neither are women of color. All women are the victims of abuse. The society begins to oppress women by teaching us we are subordinate to men and not their equals. Next we are educated that all women are not equal. We are divided as people and then allow ourselves to divide once again by our race. This must stop.

When women divide and oppose one another we are contributing to the conspiracy of silence. The conspiracy of silence is what allows women to be oppressed, beaten, sexually assaulted and harassed. The community often ignores situations of domestic violence, sexual assault, incest and rape which creates a conspiracy to encircle women into being silent.

Women must break the silence.

Women of all colors must join hands and break the silence. We can no longer stand by and watch our sisters be beaten, oppressed, discriminated against and raped without screaming with their pain and defending the blows which kill them.

Women must unite.

We need to express our thoughts, share our pain and represent ourselves. We must help our sisters of all colors and break the silence that abuses and divides us.

Stacy Malone is a Collegian columnist.

Understand the difference

In order to get along together, we have to realize we're all different. Simple, isn't it, but the world today is populated with too many people who don't understand this.

Even on our campus, there are too many ignorant people (of all colors) running around, causing more and more racial problems. People at UMass who think all of this racial tension is non-existent or "no big deal" are some of them.

Michael MORRISSEY

I'm sick of hearing my White friends saying that this stuff is being blown out of proportion. Black kids have gotten a raw deal here for some time, and they shouldn't have to take bullshit like "Niggrs suck" graffiti in the places they live.

If this has been blown out of proportion, then why have there been copycat slurs in Washington and Baker? Why have there been so many skinheads running around campus? Do you realize we are the only school in the country to have a race riot after a baseball game? This semester's problems aren't new.

What makes the attack on the RA and subsequent graffiti disturbing is the fact that the administration did absolutely nothing about it for almost a month. What they are now trying to do is misdirected. They are removing two kids from their residence halls who have been proven guilty of nothing but having the wrong person in their room at the wrong time.

The 801 Washington residents, from what I understand, had nothing to do with the offender the first weekend he went ballistic when a Black RA told him to empty his beer.

The second weekend, the weekend "Niggrs suck" was scrawled, the offender only happened to walk into a party at 801 because he was a hometown acquaintance of other students on the floor. The students in 801 were not even accused of writing the graffiti, so they are getting thrown out for having a big party.

They are responsible because they had a party, but they shouldn't be marked for death. But for a group of Black students to storm the floor, demanding the immediate removal of the students, was nothing less than mob rule at its worst. For things to change, the administration should be acting, not the students.

It seems apparent that both Blacks and Whites have acted poorly during this incident. The students who continue to scrawl on walls are cowards, afraid to accept people who look different then them. The students who trashed Morrill and told White kids who supported them to stay away last Thursday were also wrong. The whole campus was hurt by the further division of the campus.

I'll be the first to admit that I'm probably different from the average Black guy my age. We've had different friends, different parents, and different upbringings. No one culture is better. To the White kids: Don't get pissed off when Black students raise their valid complaints.

To the Black kids: as I'm sure you know, not all White people are ignorant racists. Accept the help of other kids, even if their skin color is different. Don't trash a campus that everyone has to use; you're not helping your cause, but hurting it.

Oh yeah, telling the chancellor to f—off isn't a good idea, even if you're really angry at his ineffectiveness. I agree that Mr. O'Brien has been a dunce on this, but the Black leaders should talk rationally with him now that he's come to the table.

We aren't all alike, but we're all here together, so we might as well accept each other the way we are and maybe learn something in the process.

Michael Morrissey thinks racism sucks.

Administration needs commitment

The other night I attended the meeting in the Malcolm X Center regarding the recent racial attack on Arlens Barosy and the overall racial tension on the UMass campus. The room was packed full of angry people demanding answers. Why has it taken so long for the administration to respond to this attack. Why are the police officers allowed to harass students of color? Why have so many promises to the Black community been broken? Why doesn't the New Africa House have decent furniture and phones?

The administrators present responded with as much sympathy as they could muster, which was generally expressed in the form of President Hooker's response, "You're absolutely right, I agree." They even offered an occasional solution, such as Chancellor O'Brien's solution to the disappearance of Upward Bound. He promised that funds would be "reallocated" to ensure the reinstatement of the program in the future. "The money will be found," he said, "because this issue is a priority." But why is it, Chancellor, that it took the angry outcry of an entire community, a violent racial attack and a lot of bad press to make "this issue," racism, "a priority"? Every question raised in that room came down to one question: why? And why couldn't the administrators provide a straightforward answer? Because there is one answer to every one of these questions — racism.

The end to racism on this campus isn't in the hands of students. It's in the hands of the administration that makes the rules, hires the faculty, allocates the funds and ensures the safety of students. By ignoring the issues of the minority communities for so long, the administration has been telling every person on this campus, whatever color, that racism will be tolerated. Racism on campus will not even begin to end until the the leaders of this university put an end to their own racist behavior and make a commitment to the minority communities and the cultural enrichment of every student on campus.

Faculty members, departments urged to make their voices heard

An open letter to all University Faculty:

The problems of racially motivated physical violence, violence against women, gays, lesbians and bisexuals are not new to this campus. However, the recent events in Southwest have served to bring the issues of violence and racism to the attention of the University community. Students have organized to protest the events in Southwest, and also the environment of violence that pervades this campus.

The one voice that has been missing in these protests is the voice of the faculty. While some faculty members have made their voices heard, there needs to be more of a response from departments and individual faculty members.

The administration must know that the entire University community is outraged over the repeated acts of violence occuring on this campus. Unless we all become involved in seeking solutions to the problems on our campus, acts of violence against all students will continue.

The Chancellor's response thus far has been unacceptable. It is deplorable that day after day, year after year, students are beaten, raped, assaulted and harassed in their dorms as well as on campus. We must ALL ACT to insure that EVERYONE on this campus can live safely. Therefore we, the undersigned graduate students, urge faculty and departments to write the Chancellor and other administrators about the following:

• increasing the representation of minority students to 30 percent and the hiring of more minority faculty. Currently at UMass, student representation is approximately 10 percent. Amherst College has 25 percent.

• restoration of litigation power to legal services

• scholarships for low-income students

• representation of minority students on University review committees.

• the chancellor's lamentable handling of the current situation. The University needs to decisively enforce its own rules and regulations on an equal basis.

The administration must be made aware of the fact that its slow and ineffective response to acts of violence only serves to foster an environment where violence can take place.

Within the next two weeks administrators will be making important decisions affecting the climate of this campus. We urge you to make your voices heard. They must know that the entire campus community has had enough.

Kimberley Broderick
Northampton

This letter was signed by 22 people.

More officers aren't solution

The Chancellor has promised 20 new police officers to help protect students from racial harassment. More cops is only an attempt to keep students of color "in line," not to protect them from racial harassment.

Real progress lies in increasing minority representation on campus. How many scholarships to people of color could the salaries of 20 officers fund each year?

Views from another college campus

By MARK K. ANDERSON
Collegian Correspondent

There's a difference between paranoia and caution but I can't seem to find it.

Holing in for a few days at a private liberal-arts college in Poughkeepsie, New York, where I clearly do not belong, provides a rather perverse thrill akin to standing in line at the video store with one of those Ernest movies.(Ernest Upholsters His Cousin's Conversion Van comes highly recommended, incidentally.) The rush is the constant fear of being caught.

Campus Freeloading, a recently discovered pastime, can make for a fun-laden vacation. Then again, it can also make for a fun little game of "twenty-questions" down at Campus Security if you get too cocky.

This past week brought yours truly closer to the world of Vassar College. And let me tell you, as freeloading campuses (campii?) go, this one bit. Mistah Lewpoh give it one stah.

Sponging a meal, room or library book out of these uptight upstaters is about as tough as the cafeteria omlette I ended up paying for. Everywhere you turn, you hear harassing remarks like "Can I see your ID?" or "Are you really a student here?" Did it ever occur to them that some people on campus have no affiliation with their community at all? It's almost like they want to screen out all the non-Vassar students. The nerve.

As it happens, UMass has its own share of freeloaders: Professionals. But they do it more out of necessity than anything else — another story altogether.

Excepting the above situation, Campus Freeloading can prove a delightful hobby. After all, falsifying one's true identity and usurping membership in elite communities is typically reserved for the realm of politicians, televangelists and their discarded one-night-stands.

One must be cautious of wearing out one's welcome, though. A good way to gauge the ideal duration of your own freeloading junket is the Open Bottle of Beer Rule. That is, you should sponge off any given campus for no longer than you can stand to have a (this space for sale) beer open and still find it drinkable. If, extinguished cigarette butts notwithstanding, you can stomach the leftover drinks of last night then clearly you're an overnighter at least. If the end of the weekend comes and you're willing to work on the half-empty cups from Friday, you should probably be writing this article. If Saturday's dead-soldier still shows signs of life on thursday and you volunteer to make the sacrifice then either a.)You are legally brain-dead and should seek medical help immediately, or b.)You missed all but the last hour of The Kennedy's and thus are obviously attempting to uphold the only Proud Kennedy Tradition you know of.

(Non-drinkers can substitute the Pre-Mesozoic-Era-Pizza-Found-On-The-Dorm-Room-Floor skittishness test.)

On long trips, freeloading can be a pleasant alternative to doing the Best Western thing every night. One important difference is that the Freeloader's bible is not the Triple-A Book Of Four-Star Hotels but US News And World Report's Guide To Four-Year Colleges. And calling ahead for reservations is as easy as saying "Hello admissions office? My son/daughter's name is Ima N. Heat and he/she's interested in visiting your school tonight."

To top it off, how many $200 Mariott suites come with a free art history lecture or biology field trip?

However couples traveling with little children, who typically don't look too convincing in Birkenstocks or Stüssy summer-weight nosemuffs, may find Campus Freeloading more challenging. So much for Family Values.

Now one can clearly see the futility of a UMass student slumming it down the street at our friendly local private college. Why bother? You might as well waste your time trying to get a crowd at the Haymarket to join you in reciting the Pledge of Allegiance.

But one big plus of living on the eastern seaboard (besides the courteous highway etiquette) is the plethora of small colleges and universities seemingly everywhere one looks.

Though it may seem hard to believe, some of these other schools actually have buildings that are not falling apart. A few even go so far as to put books in their library.

Thus you'd be well advised to enjoy your resemblance to a college student while you still can. (Remember in this game, all that is necessary is to look the part.) And when some campus squirrel-chaser in Rhode Island pulls you over and asks where you're from, just tell 'em you're with a guy named Richard O'Brien and can't find your way to his "Groovy Co-Ed Lovedome."

Freddie and Eddie reach nirvana through Segal

By FRANK BOUDREAU and GREG ALEXANDER
Collegian Correspondents

Sure Bruce Lee movies are great but the words don't line up with his mouth. Chuck Norris does the job but he's about as suave as an Iroc driving dude from the North End of Beantown. Jean-Claude ia a fine French scoop for you ladies but nobody kicks ass with as much style as Steven Segal. Bred in Japan, he's got the mysterious charisma and savoir-faire that it takes to dropkick Hollywoods big wigs.

Under Siege contains all the essential characteristics of a mega-million dollar blockbuster. The film is a huge production that is spectacular to watch. F-14's were shot down, helicopters and submarines were blown up and countless people were mowed down by numerous numbers of uzi bullets.

Being of sound Freddie and Eddie intellect, you might ask what more could a movie contain? Anything else would be dangerous right? Right! The intense action takes place aboard the U.S. battleship "Missouri" which is heavily armed with the latest in nuclear technology. The well placed camera shots leaves the audience with a new understanding of just how much ass this great country can kick.

The entertaining plot was sufficient but effectively reinforced with inventive fight choreography while Segal was restricted to catchy one liners only. Segal's ponytail is off but his moves are still on as he retakes control of the hijacked battleship.

He kills people with pizzazz and imagination as the expression on his face remains as calm as Hannibal Lecter's.If you're the bad guy don't become too attached to your eyeballs because Segal will most likely rip them out. If your Adam's apple means anything to you he'll jar it from your throat leaving you speechless.

Though Freddie and Eddie together could take him out, we'll leave the conflict to Tommy Lee Jones and Gary Busey. This demented duo are the colorful crazies that support the film with all the best dialogue. A smart move on the director's part because they're the only two guys that can act. These two are enjoyable to watch. They're frenzied antics make you curious just how wild it could be, before it was called mentally insane.

Once all the feeble extras are locked away like live stock, it's Segal and his bodacious girlfriend sidekick against an entire army. Being aware of our audience's outstanding wit, we'll let you predict the outcome.

For all the stiffs out there that feel explosions, blood and decapitation in film is anti-productive as a social medium, stay home! The faithful dollar is the motivation for these movies and in America, "Violence sells."

These films are rated "R" for us adult types that hopefully understand that the dead rise as soon as the director yells cut. Since we can't blow up Whitmore or raid Westover A.F.B. we may as well see it done in the movies. If it's action you want, action you get in "Under Siege".

Freddie and Eddie enthusiastically endorse "Under Siege" and deem it Stupendous. This is what good ole American violence is all about. If you want to give your stressed out brain a break and be swept away by senseless fantasy, this movie is for you.

Students with Engineering, Accounting, Pre-Med or any other abstractly boring major must see this film. It'll make you want to be a stunt man instead. Its therapeutic value for those studying to sit behind a desk for forty years is immeasurable.

This film makes you want to be eternally WIRED, and we're all paying large sums of tuition money studying to dry up as just another number in society. Get up, get mad, SIEZE THE DAY! Bungy jump, skydive, play saxophone, learn karate, have sex, and get to know Freddie and Eddie! That's the way this film makes you feel.

Until next time remember: Never give up on what you really want to do.The person with big dreams is more powerful than the one with all the facts.

There will be a Collegian Arts writers meeting Sunday at 2 pm.

Lizard album adds to punk rock vomit heap

By AUSTIN RUTLEDGE
Collegian correspondent

I picked up the new Jesus Lizard tape on Saturday night. It cost eight bucks. As soon as I got it home, my friend, Nitin grabbed it from me and insisted on hearing it. He put it into the black tape deck that sits in our living room and pressed 'play'. My housemates gathered around in the living room and we got to hear the first song on the tape:"Boilermaker". It was pretty typical of the type of music this Chicago-based band records; tight and explosive. As the first song segued into the second, I got up from my flea-infested chair to make myself a sandwich.

If I remember correctly, the sandwich was on Oatmeal-Wheat and I found it satisfying. I always try to finish off all my snacks with a nice glass of cold milk but on this particular evening we were out of milk.

In any event, I returned to the living room in time to hear the third song, "The Art of Self-Defense". It kinda sucked, but it didn't bother me because I got to thinking how important the Jesus Lizard are to the underground, garage-band music scene. After all, they've been playing together for four years, continuously beating away like a spasm in the heart of Independant rock. Like an unwanted shower, the Jesus Lizard have spat their originality and angst into the ears of depressed Cobain-heads everywhere.

The fifth song on side one is called "Puss" and if it has any words, they're completely indecipherable. David Yow, the singer of the Jesus Lizard, sounds like he has his SM-58 microphone wedged against his tonsils. For three minutes Yow wails, sounding like a cross between a leather-belt beating and a good gargle. The song's energy is evident, its meaning incoherent.

Liar is the Jesus Lizard's fourth release, succeeding Goat, Head and Pure. My friend pointed out to me that these are all four-letter words and I guess that's just the kind of band the Jesus Lizard is: a little bit nasty.

When I managed to catch them live this summer, I managed to catch singer, David Yow about 10 times as he lunged off the stage and into the crowd. In December, they will be playing in the area again, and it's worth flagging a final to get your ass to their show. But, seeing as how this is a tape review, I should probably get back to reviewing the tape.

Many of the songs on Liar sound like tales of a drunkard's night out; a bum stumbling into the gutter in front of his favorite strip-joint, only to collapse in a warm puddle of his own piss. I get the impression that singer, David Yow has experienced this phenomenon, as the lyrics to "Perk" demonstrate: "Take off your shoes if you're going to dance on me/ Don't grind your pretty heels in my face."

Liar offers a disturbed viewpoint of the world. Its perspective is remniscent of the Peter Pan bus terminal in Springfield.

As the tape rolled on and our Saturday night progressed, my housemates and I sat around trying to decide what to do for the evening. Rob said there was a party, Todd said we had tequilla and Nitin called our attention to the last song on the tape. With a twist of the volume knob we were submitted to "Dancing Naked Ladies" and it ripped and grinded into our heads like an older brother's noogie. It added further proof that with Liar the Jesus Lizard have made a respectful offering to the monument of the punk-rock vomit heap. Its energetic pace holds five times the stamina of Indie-rock basket cases like Helmet or Pavement.

Indeed Liar, like a whitened boil with a hair growing out of it, seems poised inevititably to burst all over the corpse that is modern music today.

degree in recreational sports management from Indiana University.

Page said the Arena's ice rinks will be available not only for the varsity hockey team, but also for recreational and intramural use. The facility will also be able to host entertainment events such as ice shows, circuses and concerts, he said.

"The University is looking forward to bringing the students a full diverse range of world class events," said Page.

Esckilsen said his first priority is organizing the University's events and then he can decide what outside events he can fit into the schedule. "The number of outside events I can schedule is contingent on the entertainment industry," he said.

Page said he is working with Odgen to try and get students priority seating, lower ticket prices on certain events and selling tickets to the students before they are made available to the public.

"The University recognizes the students are bearing the construction costs of the Arena and is trying to give students priority treatment," Page said.

The first week's events remain under wraps because the ticket system has not been installed yet, said Esckilsen. He said the Minutemen basketball game against West Virginia on February 4, will be nationally televised on ESPN.

[America] on behalf of corporate America."

Fulani further describes the New Alliance Party as a "Black-led, multi-racial, pro-gay, people-instead of profits independent political movement for democracy and inclusion."

According to her spokeswoman Madeline Chambers, the goal of the party is to challenge the present two-party system and build coalitions to support independent candidacies.

"We are seriously trying to break the political monopoly of the two-party system," said Chambers. "We want to teach people what it means to vote independent, and for Dr. Fulani in particular."

Chambers said the campaign does not have a realistic goal of winning the White House, but claimed that a substantial vote in favor of Fulani would add legitimacy to independent campaigns in a year where Ross Perot has presented a major challenge to both of the two major political parties.

team in the water every time."

Since the UMass win over Brown the Bears have had an interesting go of things. They lost to Washington & Lee and Harvard, both of whom UMass has beaten with at least relative ease. They also gave 12th-ranked Slippery Rock, the only team to have beaten UMass this season, all they could handle before falling. In addition, the Bears went to California and beat 10th-ranked Fresno State and 15th-ranked Cal-Davis.

The game could be a fast-paced, high-scoring affair as Yarworth feels that the way to combat Brown's game plan of defense and counter-attacks is to get UMass' counter-attack going as well. Yarworth will not be at the Brown, B.C. and Yale games due to a family commitment, and will leave the coaching to assistant coach Dan Margulis, who was a player/coach for Amherst College last year.

Yarworth says Harvard "consistently has a whole lot of talent, but they don't always do with that talent what I expect them to be able to do. They're kind of an underachieving team. But they've had three coaches in three years so that has a lot to do with it."

IN OTHER SPORTS

The UMass crew team will be at the Head of the Charles Regatta at the Charles River in Cambridge this weekend.

Also, the UMass rugby team, 4-0 in league action, will be taking on undefeated archrival Dartmouth in a match which will determine the New England North title at lower Boyden Field at 12:00 p.m.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You may need to reduce your expenses. Do what is wise and in accord with your intuition. Job changes are inevitable and will work to your advantage. Altering your lifestyle proves beneficial, too.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Although you do not want to come on too strong, now is the ideal time to promote yourself and your ideas. A confident, affable approach gets the best results on the business level.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Locally, there may not be much going on. However, distant environs could provide you with an excellent adventure. Look for a stage where you will be the star attraction.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Your close friends are behind you all the way. You will probably have to be fast on your feet to meet a deadline. Eat some Indian food with a friend tonight.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): You have an exceptional eye for value today. If there is an item to buy or a financial issue to resolve, now is the ideal time. Be diplomatic and suggest a compromise.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): A purchase for yourself or a loved one makes you feel great. Your business ideas, even the risky ones, are inspired. If your associates disagree, look for other allies.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Guard against extravagance while trying to accumulate an investment nest egg. You will never regret purchasing your own home! Be careful not to hurt your romantic partner with thoughtless words or deeds.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Show bad habits and old fears the door. Turning over a new leaf will help you triumph on all levels. A bold idea strikes like lightening. Follow through.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A good time for seeking a pay increase or making a special request. Be considerate of your co-workers' feelings, avoid bragging about a recent victory or promotion.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Interfering in someone's domestic life could make a difficult situation worse. Avoid giving unsolicited advice. Stay away from people who enjoy spreading gossip.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Your rapport with a newcomer is both rare and delightful. Use your "people skills" to win higher-ups' approval for a special project. Set your sights on a business target.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): You will soon be sitting pretty if you follow your financial instincts. Act on private information and make an important purchase all by yourself. A physical fitness program is a must.

Luke's World Series preview

On a Lind and a prayer, the Atlanta Braves will return to the World Series to face the Toronto Blue Jays. It wasn't pretty, but it sure was exciting. Three runs in the bottom of the ninth capped with a pinch-hit by Francisco Cabrera (who the hell is Francisco Cabrera ?) and Sid Bream just beating the throw to the plate. It took a little luck (error) and opportunity (a one-out walk to load the bases and move the winning run into scoring position),but the Braves became the first NL team to repeat since Los Angeles in 1977 and 1978.

Luke
ERICKSON

Toronto won the AL despite the tactics of manager Cito Gaston. Leaving Jack Morris in to pitch the ninth of game one, and pitching David Cone rather than Jimmy Key with a 3-1 series lead for game five has left many people wondering.

THE 1992 WORLD SERIES THUMBNAIL PREVIEW

The first thing that's usually considered is home field advantage. The Royals and Mets proved it was possible to win games on the road in 1985 and 1986, while the Minnesota Twins won the series in 1987 and 1991 by winning all eight home games. Atlanta's home advantage is a factor if the Series goes more than 5 games.

The Braves were not significantly better at home then on the road. Of course, that means they were dominant no matter where they played. The real effect comes from the fact that Toronto can only use Dave Winfield as a DH for three games.

Usually in a short series, the team with the best pitching wins. Atlanta's starters are phenomenal, the relievers, well, not quite as good. Toronto can match Atlanta as far as David Cone and Juan Guzman, but Jack Morris is a question mark. A gamer, a gut-check veteran, but also shelled in his last outing. Toronto's relievers may not seem dominating , but they were the difference in the ALCS.

It is also noted that the team with the strongest momentum going into the World Series will win, too. Toronto won 14 of its last 20 regular season games, holding off a Milwaukee charge, and were only outplayed in game five of the ALCS. Atlanta was on cruise control going into the NLCS, but were basically shut down for the last three games until the ninth of game seven. Atlanta's on an emotional high, but Toronto's has got all the parts in their baseball machine well-tuned and running.

The Call? Many people are rooting for Atlanta because they have a lot of heart and lot of character (yes, and a lot of talent, too). Toronto, on the other hand has got them matched if not beaten at every position except third base, and the most important position: manager. Atlanta in 6 with a loss and wishing they had just one more quarter to catch the Chiefs.

Randall's boys take the traveling show to Washington, where the Skins had a huge win in front of the nation on Monday night, as they drubbed Denver. However, it is time for the Eagles to get back to their winning ways, marked by a stellar performance for Reggie White and the GangGreen defense. Philadelphia 17, Washington 7.

Deion Sanders didn't have a clue when it came to hitting a baseball this past week, but he can cover receivers like a blanket. Not to mention he is a kickoff/ punt return wizard.

The 49ers struggled with the potent passing attack of Hugh Millen (give me a break). San Francisco is the most overrated 5-1 team in the league, beating teams with a combined record of 7-15. As the commercial says, I think you hear me knockin', and I'm bringing Deion and his 27 nicknames with me. Atlanta 24, San Francisco 20.

The Packers (yes, the team from Green Bay) travel to the armpit of the country, Cleveland, to take on the Browns in the "Who really cares" Bowl. Well, Brett Favre, quarterback of the Pack, is a budding superstar in this league, and he should shred the Dawgs (who belong in Georgia). Don Majkowski better start looking elsewhere for a job, because his now belongs to the rookie. Green Bay 17, Cleveland 6.

Kansas City had to win last week against Philly in order to put itself among the NFL elite. When you have the talent, preparation by your coaching staff can beat a team who is overlooking its opponent.

Dallas has something to prove after last week's shellacking of Seattle. The Cowboys can prove that Seattle let Dave Krieg go for a reason: inconsistency. Dreams only happen once in a quarterback's life, and Krieg had his against the Eagles. Dallas must win to snag the number one ranking from rival Philly. Dallas 21, Kansas City 20.

Homecoming special: Mike Hodges' Minutemen host YanCon rival UConn tomorrow in the biggest game thus far for the new regime of UMass football. UMass poses a threat on both sides of the ball, with pro-prospect Don Caparotti anchoring the defense, and former Stud of the Week Rene Ingoglia leading the potent running attack.

UMass' strength, which is running the ball down the opponent's throat, will be aimed at a weakness of the Huskies, rushing defense. They have given up 176 yards per game this season on the ground. A 4-1 record going into the game with Villanova sounds good to me. Massachusetts 24, Connecticut 16.

Although the Minutewomen dominated the Rams in a 4-0 regular season win last season, the Rams played UMass tough in the A-10 Tournament, but UMass prevailed 2-0.

The loss of superstar forward Andrea Gomez has hurt the Rams, as they have struggled to a 2-9 season.

Rhode Island is fighting for their lives, as they are in danger of not even making the A-10 Tournament.

Minutemen host UConn at Homecoming

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

It's time once again for that annual rite of fall they call Homecoming and the University of Massachusetts football team couldn't be happier.

After playing three out of their first four games on the road, the Minutemen (3-1) will play the first contest of a three-game homestand when the Huskies of the University of Connecticut travel to Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium for a 1:30 p.m. kickoff.

"We're very excited about coming home," said head coach Mike Hodges. "We talked about it after last week's win and it's a big deal for our guys to play three games in a row at home."

First up on the menu for Hodges and company will be UConn.

Last year against UConn, UMass recovered the onsides kick with 2:00 left and was down by only five points (26-21), but did not score. Overall, UConn has dominated the series over the past decade, winning 7 of the last 9 meetings, so the Minutemen would like nothing better than a victory on Homecoming day.

The Huskies boast one of the best players in the Yankee Conference in free safety Mark Chapman, who leads the YanCon in interceptions with four in five games. Chapman also leads the league in punt returns with a 13.5 avg./game. Defensive tackle Rob Belcure was named to the YanCon honor roll last week for his 11 tackle, one sack performance. Offensively, the UMass defense will have to contend will have to contend with tailback Ed Long (477 yards, 4 TDs), who leads a group of backs who have rushed for 905 yards (181/game).

UConn QB Tom DeSarno (70-142 yds. 1TD), has two very reliable receivers in flanker Alex Davis (team high 20-247 yds, 2 TD's) and tight end Brian Kozlowski (6'3, 250). Kozlowski has to be one of the biggest tight ends UMass will see all year.

"UConn is the best complete package that we've seen all season," said Hodges. "Most teams that we've played have been oriented to one side of the ball but they are the most balanced - they run well and their play action pass is very effective.

Indeed the offense is effective as they rolled up over 400 yards on total offense against undefeated Villanova. UMass will have to bring out all their guns to counter this.

The return of inside linebacker Bobby Burke (he played last week — nine tackles) will certainly bolster the already impressive Minuteman defense, which is led by all-everything cornerback Don Caparotti and outside linebacker Mario Perry. In the first four games, Perry's had an impressive seven QB sacks.

The offense, with the likes of fullback Mike George (128 yds rushing last week), tight end Steve Dembowski and quarterback Andrew McNeilly, will also have to come up big on homecoming day. Dembowski (6-87) came out of nowhere last week against URI to be UMass' offensive player of the week and will likely be a main target for McNeilly. When McNeilly's not passing, George, as well as the tailback-tandem of John Johnson and Rene Ingoglia, will lead a running attack that averages 227.0 yards/game.

"We're a fun team to watch, and so is UConn," said Hodges. "It's Homecoming weekend and tailgating is back, so it'd be great if we could fill that stadium."

Minutemen Notes: The game can be seen on Channel 22 with Rich Tettemer (play-by-play) and Bob Rumbold (color).

Pigskin picks: Week seven

Yes, fans, it is gut check time in the NFL. Week seven is when the good teams like Buffalo put up, and the overrated teams like Pittsburgh shut up. So jump on the bandwagon, because Stapleton's Pigskin Picks are back for another weekly installment.

Arthur
STAPLETON

Stud of the Week: As a Dallas fan, I must tip my hat to the classiest wide receiver in the league, the Washington Redskins' Arthur Monk. On Monday night, Monk overtook Steve Largent and moved to the pinnacle of the list of NFL career receptions. With seven catches for 69 yards against the Broncos, he reached the 820 mark, passing Largent's 819. Mr. Monk proved once again that all men named Arthur are destined for greatness.

Rankings this week: In the AFC, 1. Dolphins, 2. Oilers, 3. Chiefs, 4. Bills, 5. Broncos.

In the NFC, 1. Eagles, 2. Cowboys, 3. 49ers, 4. Redskins, 5. Saints.

Weekend challenge for women

Forward Tara Jelley and the University of Massachusetts field hockey team face two tough road opponents this weekend in Villanova and Rhode Island.

After almost two weeks between serious competition, the University of Massachusetts field hockey team embarks on a road trip to face two teams out for their blood.

Both Villanova University, whom the Minutewomen (12-1) will play today at 6 p.m., and the University of Rhode Island (Sunday, 2 p.m.) need a win against the Minutewomen for different reasons. The Wildcats are a team that UMass cannot afford to take lightly.

Villanova is 9-4 and has won six in a row, but the team has not claimed a major scalp yet. They are hoping a victory against Massachusetts will propel them into the top 20 and keep their postseason hopes alive.

For Villanova, Melissa Rea and Bree Hawthorne are tied for the team lead in goals for five, while Barbara King and Staci Verzera have four each. The quartet of forwards may offset UMass' strong defenders.

In the cage, Chrissy Thomas has handled most of the action for the Wildcats, logging 118 saves in 862 minutes for a goals-against average of 0.90. With only three seniors on the squad, Villanova must make up with intensity what they lack in experience. The up-and-coming Wildcats will be hungry for the Minutewomen.

The Minutewomen do not have to make up any reasons to get up for Sunday's Atlantic 10 Conference game versus Rhode Island. A win against their A-10 foe gives Massachusetts a perfect conference record. It also gives them a great way to end their three-game road trip.

"We definitely want a perfect 3-0 road trip," UMass

Men host Hawks today

BY JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN
The University of Massachusetts men's soccer team host St. Joseph's today at 2:30 p.m. and Hofstra at 2:00 p.m. on Sunday.

Last weekend, the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team (6-4-1) played two games on the road and came away with a loss (West Virginia) and an postponement (George Washington). This weekend the Minutemen hope to have better luck at home, where they have two home games.

Today UMass plays host to the St. Joseph's University Hawks (4-6-3) in a big Atlantic 10 contest at 2:30 p.m. at Garber Field. A victory for the Minutemen would help in their quest for preferred positioning in the A-10 championships. Then, on Sunday, UMass will host the Hofstra University Flying Dutchmen (6-9-0).

In St. Joseph's, the Minutemen will face a team which is winless in the A-10 (0-2-1). However, this record belies the fact that the Hawks are a tough team. St. Joe's played Rutgers strongly before falling 4-1, and tied George Washington 2-2.

Leading the Hawks offense is junior forward co-captain Don D'Ambra. D'Ambra has taken a total of 52 shots on the year with nine of them finding net. With 20 points on the year D'Ambra has let it be known that he is one of the bigger offensive forces in the A-10.

Other offensive leaders for St. Joseph's include diminutive sophomore forward John McIntyre (11 points) and sophomore forward John Sharp (10 points).

Manning the net for St. Joseph's is a three-headed monster known as VlietBowmanKeady. Separated, the individuals who have started for the Hawks this year are freshman Sean Vliet, junior Erik Bowman, and junior Jim Keady.

Vliet has proven to be the most effective of the three in net, posting a sterling .53 goals-against-average and .895 save percentage.

Hofstra will be lead into Sunday's battle (2:00 p.m., Garber Field) by freshman forward Zak Wright. Wright has potted

Water polo face real competition at N.E.L.T.s

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

After nearly a month of practice and playing teams that range from slightly to very inferior, the University of Massachusetts water polo team should see some good competition this weekend as they travel to Harvard University for the New England League Tourney.

"The standings for this tournament determine the seedings for the New England Championships," said coach Russ Yarworth. "We'd love to get the top seed by winning this tournament because then, at the New England Championship, we won't have to play Brown or Harvard before we hit the championship game."

The schedule is as follows: Friday night at 8:45 p.m. against M.I.T., which should provide the non-starters with some decent playing time; Saturday at 11:30 a.m. against Harvard and 3:30 p.m. against Brown; and Sunday against Boston College and Yale.

The 16-1, 14th-ranked Minutemen have never won the N.E. title, but are playing like they are primed to do just that this season. Brown, 11-8 and ranked 18th nationally, and 8-3 Harvard, ranked 21st, figure to provide the only real opposition in the two rounds. The Minutemen have a healthy and lengthy past with both squads.

UMass was a 9-7 winner over Brown in the first tournament of this season, but that was a long time ago and a lot has happened to the Bears since.

"They're a completely different team and are very well coached," Yarworth said. "Maybe they don't have the talent they've had in the past, but they still put a good

This year's Homecoming full of new twists

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

What is Homecoming? Homecoming is different things for different people. For alumni it is a return to the alma mater, for students, another excuse for inebriation, and for the University of Massachusetts football team, a chance to shine in the sun.

Luckily, this weekend's game (Saturday at 1:30 p.m.) at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium against the University of Connecticut will have something for everyone. This year's game is different in a number of ways: it is the first Homecoming for rookie head coach Mike Hodges, who, along with interim athletic director Glenn Wong, has promoted the on-field performance of the 3-1 Minutemen, one of the surprising stories of the fall.

Secondly, tailgating is back! For the first time since 1986, students and alumnus will be able to hold pregame barbecues and beerfests in the E lot adjacent to Alumni Stadium.

"We're trying to encourage more people to come to the games," ticket manager Thorr Bjorn said. "The majority of tailgaters are students, but it's open for all, and it really makes it an enjoyable day."

In the first game since the ban was lifted, about 200 cars came to tailgate before UMass' 30-28 victory over Boston University. Bjorn said that foul weather hampered the attendence, but he's looking for a big turnout Saturday.

"The student lot, E lot, will be set up for tailgating, and there will be adequate security there," said Bjorn.

"I'd like to ask students who won't be tailgating to remove their cars on Friday night to allow for more space for the large turnout."

Third, and most importantly, the game not only features contending Yankee Conference teams, but an influx of returning alumni ready to welcome the Minutemen. The Homecoming game has traditionally brought thousands of dollars into the Pioneer Valley economy, and this year looks to be no different.

So with the renewal of the age-old tradition, the new look team, the new look coach and the new tailgating policy are sure to make this year's Homecoming one of the best ever!

Second earthquake kills 2 in Colombia

BOGOTA, Colombia (AP) — The second severe earthquake in two days struck Colombia on Sunday, this time rocking the entire country. Two people were reported killed and numerous buildings destroyed.

The temblor hit at 11:15 a.m. EDT and lasted about two minutes. It registered above 7 on the Richter scale, Hans Meyer, director of the Seismic Institute in the southern city of Cali, told the radio network.

Preliminary findings put the epicenter at about 185 miles northwest of Bogota, almost the same spot as Saturday's earthquake, which measured 6.6 on the Richter scale.

Sunday's tremor caused panic across Colombia. In Bogota, the capital city of 6 million, people ran out of their shaking buildings into the streets. Traffic lights were swinging wildly.

Two hours later people were still milling in the streets, clutching their belongings, afraid to return to their homes, Bogota's Crypton television news reported.

"This is the greatest earthquake to hit Colombia since Dec. 12, 1979," Meyer said.

The temblor measured 7.9 on the Richter scale and killed 800 people in Colombia and Ecuador.

Sunday's quake was felt in every part of the country, from the north Caribbean Coast south to the Amazon River, according to RCN radio.

One child died in the northwestern village of Vigia del Puerto, 100 miles from Medellini, and other children were injured, according to news reports citing the national Red Cross. In the southern city of Paereira, a mother died of a heart attack following the quake, according to radio reports.

Two people were injured in Puerto Tejada, outside the southern city of Cali, when a lamppost fell on them, said the Red Cross.

A damaged roof in a nothern Medellin suburb lightly injured four people, according to a RCN radio interview with Ramiro Monsalve, the director of Medellin firefighters.

Saturday's earthquake partially destroyed the fishing village of Murindo, 90 miles northwest of Medellin in Antioquia state.

Reporter describes her role in Anita Hill affair

By RACHEL D. MEDANIC
Collegian Correspondent

Talking about how the future political climate could affect future appointments to the Supreme Court, Nina Totenberg, famed reporter for the National Public Radio said, "I think it's fair to ask, `What is their life experience? Do they have a broad exposure to. . . the life of people whose lives they will be ruling on?'"

Totenberg addressed a nearly-packed auditorium Thursday night at Symphony Hall in Springfield as part of the Springfield Public Forums sponsored by the Springfield Adult Education Council.

Totenberg was the reporter who broke the story last fall alleging that Justice Clarence Thomas had sexually harassed his employee, Anita Hill.

Totenberg has won many awards for excellence in covering the Supreme Court and for her coverage of legal affairs.

Though her speech was more concerned with the Supreme Court, Totenberg answered questions afterward. When asked to give her opinion on how the Thomas-Hill trials affected Black Americans, Totenberg declined to offer her view.

"I don't have an informed opinion," said Totenberg. "It would be presumptuous for me to try to answer that question."

But at the same time she asserted that, "The Senate Judiciary Committee was an accident that was waiting to happen.

"I didn't do anything that I will ever, ever apologize for. I waited for her to ask for an interview. . . I did not blackmail her. I did everything possible to be sure

U.S. searches for POWs

Said secretly looking in Asia for 10 years

By JOHN DIAMOND
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Secretly, for the past decade, U.S. intelligence agencies have been flying planes, satellites and unmanned drones over Southeast Asia in search of missing American POWs.

Highly sophisticated and classified photographic imaging techniques have given intelligence gatherers a surprisingly detailed overhead view of the former war zone where scores of Americans remain unaccounted for.

The photographs, infrared views, and other images have used to tell the relative height of a man, show whether a prison camp gate is kept open or closed, distinguish between a pile of rice stubble and other agricultural material, and estimate the last time a building got a paint job.

Representatives of the Defense Intelligence Agency, the CIA and the Pentagon appearing before the committee last week argued repeatedly with the committee, chaired by Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., over how much should be said in open session.

But in the end, the officials reluctantly unveiled a great deal about their capabilities.

"When someone mentions photographs, we probably think of the snapshots we get back from the drug store," Duane Andrews, assistant defense secretary for intelligence, told the committee.

The serial images collected by intelligence agencies are "produced by very high technology processes involving devices which transform the varying light signals into digital signals. These digital signals can be read out on very high resolution work stations — a kind of very high definition television," Andrews testified.

Among other things, the cameras are capable of taking two images of the same area slightly apart in time to produce what looks like a three dimensional result.

Despite the end of the Cold War, the Pentagon and the CIA are still jittery about discussing these overhead photographic techniques. The Persian Gulf War was one recent example in which serial imagery capable of distinguishing between actual defense installations and decoys was used extensively.

As a result, although Andrews discussed some of the images taken over Southeast Asas, DIA released only facsimile line drawings of them.

"If a camera scientist can get his hands on an image, he can determine many characteristics of the camera that took the picture," Andrews told the committee. "We do not want the scientists of other countries to obtain such knowledge of our technical capabilities. Such knowledge would help them hide things from us that we need to see to support our military forces and for national security."

In dozens of instances, DIA was able to determine that what looked like symbols etched on the ground, possibly made by POWs were actually mere shadows of treetops. In a few instances, the intelligence community followed up.

Dining Commons staff says breakfast essential

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

When freshman Calli Quinn bit into a soggy waffle one morning at the Worester Dinning Commons, she was so distraught with the taste that she mailed it home to her parents.

Yet in missing out in her breakfast, Quinn may be shortening her life span, according to a 10-year study done at the University of California. The study concluded that those who eat breakfast on a regular basis live longer than those who do not.

"What your mom said about breakfast being important was true," said Food Service's administrative dietitian, Joyce Meier Fredrick. "Hungry kids don't learn.

Eating breakfast results in greater efficiency in studying. And, those who have breakfast tend to have an overall more positive outlook, according to Fredrick. Furthermore, she said, breakfast is one of the most nutritious meals of the day. It has been shown through studies that those who eat breakfast tend not to overeat at lunch and munch on high-calorie snaks.

"It is not essential that you eat a big breakfast. Students should still try to have something like orange juice and bagels in their room if they can't make it to the DC," Fredrick said.

Worcester Dinning Commons and Hampshire Dinning Commons offer breakfast from 7 a.m. to 10:30 a.m. on weekdays. In addition to the two main hot dishes, there is a breakfast bar with two cans of fresh fruit, raisins, and other breakfast foods. They also offer breakfast cereals that have been selected by the students through a survey.

Yet there are some students, who are not pleased with some of the choices.

"Better selection of fruit. I don't want canned fruit and I want eggs that look like eggs," said Ted Salonich, a senior hotel restaurant and travel administration major. "Bagels are better than they used to be. They used to be rock hard."

Although at one time students could toast their own bread at the DC, the toasters caused too many fires, according to Fredrick. One of the problems encountered with the toasters is that students would put peanut butter on the bread before they would toast it. An employee now toasts the bread for the students.

But even with these restrictions many students still come to breakfast.

"I enjoy my breakfast. It is the best meal they serve. I always have cereal. I have eggs everyday," said sophomore astronomy major Andy La Porte. "I love those sweet buns. I haven't seen those in a long time."

Food Services tests all its recipes with HTRA students judging, according to Food Service's Dietitian Dianne Sutherland, who heads this program for HRTA majors. Food Services get their recipes from students, in addition from other schools. Tastes differ from school to school. The hashbrown pie was a favorite at a near-by school, but it flopped at UMass, Fredrick said.

"When it comes to future meals, it is student driven," Sutherland said. "You watch for what is coming in menu trends."

Sutherland said in the future, foods from the Orient will become more popular along with vegetarian meals. Lemon, yogurt, cornmeal, banana and orange flavored pancakes will be served the week of Oct. 26. The pancakes, by the way, will be made from scratch.

Yet with cooking for so many students, it takes a skill in serving so many students, Fredrick said.

"[The cooks] are continually cooking, so it is fresh on the line. [It is called] batch cooking," Fredrick said. "The cooks job is to keep an eye on the line. You don't want to make too much, but you don't want to throw out too much food."

"If you don't like waffles there are so may options," Fredrick added. "Every day could be a different meal."

that I wasn't a tool for some vindictive woman."

In her opening political statements she said, "I would venture to say that if President Bush is re-elected, the court will become yet more conservative.

"If Bill Clinton is elected, the court will moderate considerably but will not become liberal. . . because the youngest members of the court are its most conservative members.

"There is no left left on the court," she said.

Totenberg said she expected three or four vacancies on the court in the next few years, namely Justices Harry Blackmun and John Paul Stevens. As another possibility, she thought that the retirement of Justice Byron White, " would make some significant difference."

As other possibilities, Totenberg mentioned Chief Justice William Rehnquist, who suffered the death of his wife a year ago and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor who has suffered breast cancer in the past few years.

Totenberg told a story about Justice O'Connor who was attending a private conference with the other justices on affirmative action. Justice Antonin Scalia objected to affirmative action because, "he saw it as an affront to Ameritocracy" to which O'Connor leaned over the table and said, "And you know, how do you think I got my job?"

Garbage rises despite recycling

By CLIFF EDWARDS
Associated Press

CHICAGO — Manufacturers increasingly are stocking store shelves with the three environmental Rs — reusable, reduced packaged or recycled items.

But industry experts say the move toward "going green" may be going bust. Figures show the amount of garbage heading to landfills each year is rising.

"On a per capita basis, we're each throwing away a little less trash than in previous years, but that little bit is not enough to prevent an increase in the overall amount each year as the population grows," said John Wood of Franklin Associates, a Prairie Village, Kan., firm that gathers data from industry groups for use by the Environmental Protection Agency.

The amount of trash in 1990, the last year available, rose to 162.3 million tons from 110 million five years previous, according to Franklin Associates. A third of the trash comes from packaging.

Manufacturers now are turning toward reusable, or refillable packages as a quick cure to the problem.

"There are more refills out there, partly due to the fact that it's an environmental improvement and partly because of economic facts," said Janet Mansfield, a statistician for Marketing Intelligence Service Ltd., a company that tracks U.S. product introductions.

Refills can be made with less packaging — meaning less trash heads to the landfills.

The image of crumpled refill bags versus hard plastic bottles also has an effect on consumers, said Greg Erickson, editor in chief of Packaging magazine.

"Whereas you can see an empty plastic bottle, now come items are packaged in plastics that you can crumple so small . . . it seems to disappear in the trash," he said.

One company, L&F Products, a division of Eastman Kodak, worked with European packaging engineers to develop a stand up refill bag for its liquid household cleaners. It says the reclosable refill bag uses 75 percent less plastic than trigger bottles and, when emptied, takes up 65 percent less space in landfills than an empty trigger bottle.

The drawback, however, is the package is made of non-recyclable plastic. The amount of non-recyclable plastic now in garbage is 32 times the amount it was in 1980, according to the 1992 Environmental Almanac.

Joseph Healy, president of the household products division for L&F Products, said the company's new product does have that flaw, but at least is making a dent in the waste stream.

Another benefit of refillable items is that because the products have less packaging, they are less expensive for the company that makes them and for the cost conscious consumer.

A study by the U.S. Dept. of Agriculture indicated that for every $1 Americans spend on a particular item, 8.5 cents goes toward packaging. Refillable items reduce costs for manufacturers, who often pass the savings on consumers, industry groups say.

Despite the increase in refillable items, environmental activists and packaging industry groups say the greatest trend toward reducing the amount of trash is source reduction — cutting the amount of packaging surrounding a product at the factory instead of relying on home recycling.

The industry has responded to recent criticism about so called redundant packaging by quietly removing layers of packaging.

CAMPUS SHORTS

compiled by David Massey

This isn't the menu

Campus Shorts is back from a week-long hiatus due to last Monday's Columbus Day or Genocide Day or Indigenous Peoples' Day or whatever you'd like to call it.

It's also nice to report that the Telefund folks who raise money for the University are back in Memorial Hall doing their telemarketing thing. Unfortunately, the students who took-over Memorial Hall protesting Columbus Day won't be so lucky.

"The students will be disciplined for breaking the student code," said Chancellor Richard O'Brien at a Faculty Senate meeting last week.

As of press time, Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin is said to be waiting for a report detailing damages the building sustained during the take-over and also the costs of extra security during the week-long sit-in.

Meanwhile, the University has identified two students as hosts to the person who allegedly attacked a Black resident assistant.

"The University is considering what disciplinary action to take," said Karin Sherbin, University spokesperson. "UMass police were able to identify the host because of student cooperation."

How true, how true

While minority students and top administration officials report "very optimistic" results from a private Saturday meeting, UMass president summed up years of frustration in a quote featured in the Boston Globe's editorial page "Quotes of Note" on Friday:

"I know people are angry given the empty promises for 15 years." On Friday, Chancellor O'Brien unveiled his plan to combat racism on campus, including the reallocation of funding for Upward Bound, the hiring of 20 new security personnel and improved human relations training for all campus staff.

In announcing his 11-point plan, O'Brien said, "Now we need a little more talk and a great deal of action." If it took the beating of a Black RA and the subsequent storming of Washington Tower to alert top campus officials about racism on campus, we still have a long way to go.

Hooray for Clinton

U.S. Representative Joseph Kennedy will be the main speaker at a Clinton rally scheduled for this Thursday from 5 to 7 p.m. by the campus pond.

State Senator Stan Rosenberg (D-Amherst) and Representative Ellen Story (D-Amherst) are expected to attend the evening rally.

Major managing

O.K., now let's get this straight. You entered UMass as a chemical engineering major with a minor in Spanish. Now maybe your minor should be your major.

But, waste management as a major is looking really inviting but you're not sure. Then you fill out some paperwork in triplicate and switch to a major in English with a minor in social thought and political protesting. College is a time for experimentation, right?

Major-switching can result in a prolonged college stay , according to the author of How to Choose a Major: The College Student's Guide, James K. Hickel, president of Real World Associates, a firm specializing in helping students in the post-college world, says lengthy college careers can hurt one's job prospects.

"Businesses are looking for employees and potential executives who can demonstrate a sense of direction," says Hickel. "A history of spending five or six years in college, toying with different potential majors, often won't even get you in for the first interview."

Students need a "sense of focus," warns Hickel, and should carefully research their own personal interests and pinpoint areas with the highest career potential.

Nevertheless, recent studies indicate about half of all students switch majors at least once during their academic careers.

And 15 percent change their majors more than once, according to Hickel.

President's past record shows success in racial issues

UMass president, Michael K. Hooker

AMHERST, Mass. — Michael Hooker — 47, White, and earning a reported $175,000 a year — was winning young friends last week at the Malcolm X Cultural Center.

Hooker's admirers were not surprised. They say Hooker, the new president of the University of Massachusetts, is ideally suited to push for peace after weeks of campus racial attacks, graffiti, and a rampage by students fearful about dormitory security.

"If Michael Hooker cannot do it, I don't know who can," said Willie B. Lamousse-Smith, a professor of Afro-American studies at the University of Maryland - Baltimore County. "He's very bright, he's very humane . . . and he tries to focus on the present and future."

Indeed, Hooker is widely credited with promoting racial harmony at his previous job as president at Lamousse-Smith's campus. Hooker shows a flair for negotiating in a crisis and thinking through the deeper issues that emerge. And he knows his new territory as a former student at the Amherst campus.

Still, Hooker faces a daunting task in steering this campus from violence, persuading minority students that long-broken promises will be kept, and marshaling the money to make up for years of budget cuts.

"We finally have someone higher up in the administration to hear our call," Al Lizena, a leader of the campus Black Student Union, said at a student meeting with Hooker last week at the center named for 1960s Black power icon, Malcolm X.

But Lizana added, "Let me tell you what we're used to

Speaker outlines natives' needs

Marcos Avirama spoke last night, through an English speaking interpreter, in commemoration of 500 years of Indian resistance in Latin America. An indigenous leader from Coconuco, Colombia, Mr. Avirama has worked for the past 26 years to further land and cultural rights of indigenous Colombians.

Mr. Avirama began by introducing five main points that the indigenous people see as necessary for their independence and what constitutes their natural rights.

First and foremost is the reclamation of lands for indigenous people. Their land was taken from them through trickery, assassination, and the brutal mistreatment of their ancestors.

Second, education is sought for the language and the culture of the communities to remain.

Third, health is a fundamental by making use of resources, medicine and traditional plants.

Fourth, an independent government is necessary to insure enforcement of law and the right to govern themselves in their own communities.

Finally, economic independence is necessary to develop community companies and enterprises that will improve the economic conditions for the people.

Avirama noted that the most important one of the five was the reclaiming of land. "The earth is the fundamental basis of the development of our culture," he stated.

He went further to explain that land is the natural and spiritual nourishment as well as the political support for the communities. Therefore, the issue of land creates a direct confrontation with the landowners and the government of Colombia by the indigenous people. "Men, women, and children have been killed and put into jail for defending their lands," he added.

Distributed at the lecture, a press release from the Consejo Regional Indigena Del Cauca described one of the most recent violations by the Colombian government. Previously agreeing to a peaceful march by indigenous people in protest of the Quincentennial celebrations, "members of the armed forces fired into the crowd in a blatant violation of the signed agreement, wounding several people."

Urgent action appeals were made by Amnesty International, and the U.S. Senate sent a letter condemning the violence. The senate also urged the president of Colombia to conduct investigations to find those responsible for the murders, attempted murders, and threats against human rights workers.

The lecture by Marcos Avirama was sponsored by the Graduate Student Senate, STPEC, AHORA, and the Latin American Studies Program.

Mather aide helps women plan careers

By KATHLEEN L. TEEHAN
Collegian Correspondent

An assistant director at the Mather Career Center told an audience of women last Wednesday that career planning begins with a careful self-assessment of a woman's personal values, interests, skills and aptitudes.

"This is key whether you are looking for your first job or your 30th," said Ginger Goldsbury, who has been an assistant director at Mather Career Center for 13 years.

It is necessary to research career opportunities and network said Goldsbury. She said by talking to people, a woman can establish contacts and gain an insider's view of a particular job.

Goldsbury said it is vital that a woman has a definite idea of what she wants from a job. Employers want to see women who are confident to know they are able to handle the job she said.

Potential employers are influenced by independence, maturity and direction toward a specific goal said Goldsbury.

Women should look for jobs in fast-growing small and mid-sized companies and organizations, said Goldsbury, which offer the most opportunity for a woman at an entry-level position.

UMass has an extensive network of alumni working all over the country in many different occupations said Goldsbury. She encouraged the women present at the workshop to take advantage of other career research libraries in the Five-College program.

seeing after someone says 'I agree': We're used to seeing neglect."

It was inside a nearby dormitory that a Black student was allegedly punched and subjected to racial slurs on Sept. 25 when he asked a group of Whites to stop drinking.

At least 30 students demanding more protection rampaged through the 22-story dormitory on Oct. 8, scrawling anti-White slurs on the walls and prompting residents to lock themselves in their rooms. A rash of racist graffiti — both anti-Black and anti-White — and alleged assaults has followed.

Many blame the administration, saying it has allowed racism to fester on campus. Richard O'Brien, the campus' British-born chancellor, was forced into an unseemly rush out a side door as minority students shouted insults at the end of one meeting.

But Hooker appeared to make inroads at the cultural center. Tie and sport jacket discarded, he started straight into the faces of angry students, beaming a sympathetic smile. Some spoke menancingly of violence in the two weeks if their demands were not met, but most just pleaded for more security, resources and minority presence on campus.

Hooker said he generally agreed with their ideas but made few specific commitments. He said students and faculty must work out programs with on-campus leadership, and O'Brien quickly backed him up with promises of 20 more campus security officers and other measures.

Hooker said as leader of the five-campus system, he would furnish the commitment, drive and "moral leadership" to advance minority interests and nurture a climate of multiculturalism.

Praise, damnation of the American way from England

There was always the temptation, the temptation when it came around to Column Time to take the easy option and write a piece on the "hilarious" consequences of Anglo-American misunderstandings. Pavement and sidewalk, curtains and drapes not to mention the endless comic possibilities of an innocent English request for a fag. Well, I've succumbed. Here is a celebration and a damnation of America; please take it in the spirit in which it is given (Sunday morning fuzziness).

First the food. Like the Japanese of industrial myth Americans have taken the foods of the world and adapted and improved them until the pizza is better than in Palermo, the feta better than in Athens, the burrittos better than in Mexico City and just about everything is better than in Manchester. And when it comes, it comes in huge, inhuman quantities. If food equals life then America is making a bid for immortality through size of portion.

The only thing that can maybe put me off my tree-trunk burritto is the sight of Norman Schwarzkopf smiling coquettishly from the cover of Newsweek, apparently unaware that maybe sporting analogies are not entirely appropriate for the description of the killing of large numbers of retreating soldiers.

Still, off I go to The Game for an unadulterated slice of Americana. Now, everyone is allowed their prejudice against a sport. Woody Allen says swimming is not a sport, but rather a technique to avoid drowning; Oscar Wilde thought golf a good way to ruin a pleasant walk. It seems to me American football (not to be confused with real football played, naturally, with the feet) is a poor excuse for a half-time show. Why do you need semi-naked women dancing on the sidelines if not to compensate for the tremendous tedium of a game essentially consisting of attempts by the teams to stop the opposition from doing anything exciting?

Jesse
ARMSTRONG

At UMass the authorities have been kind enough to allow the spectators to get blind drunk outside the stadium before having to sit through a game, a humanitarian gesture indeed, but causing the curious anomaly in which the only place you can avoid the ridiculous alcohol policy and drink openly on campus is right by the car you are about to stumble into and swerve home in. Clearly you pay your $5 for a permit to drink-drive and distribute booze to the underaged.

If football is to be "enjoyed" at all it should be in the comfort of your home, on a big '70s-style TV. After all it is a game trapped in "the decade style forgot," dressed in those big burlesque costumes, parodies of manhood mince in disco colors and you can so easily imagine Nixon's ashen appearing in a news flash with some grave assurance of his administration's probity.

Despite Nixon, and all the other nightmares the American dream has passed through, there is a strong residual optimism in the United States, lost, I think, in England. Maybe optimism is the wrong word; maybe it is an openness. Cynicism, sarcasm and irony do not reign here in the same self-defeating way they do on my small, tight-minded island. It is indeed a fake sophistication granted by an unbreachable wall of cynicism; nevertheless it is curious for a Briton to encounter American enthusiasm. George Orwell said fascism could never succeed in Britain because the people would laugh at soldiers goose-stepping, but likewise this self-consciousness, I think, would prevent the raising of a team of cheerleaders or a huge costumed marching band at a British university.

Anyway, did I mention the other day I was walking along the pavement and I stopped this bloke and asked him for a fag. . .

Silly protests make bad impression

It's October again, and the leaves are turning color. There will probably be a sit-in at the physical plant to protest University workers' treatment of leaves of color.

October means classes are in full swing, and people should have better things to do than keep mid-level University administrators up all night.

I bet not one protestor brought his homework. But that's okay, because these brave little troopers are getting the kind of education that can't be taught in a class.

Staying up all night with nothing but moral outrage and Ovaltine to keep their spirits high will make them better for it. Maybe next semester the University will add a sit-in fee to the bill. Slip it in between authority fee and MassPirg and wham! — you can pay for someone to be on call to babysit hippies wherever and whenever they decide to stop in for the night — or two — or until they get bisexual native Canadian women of color on the UMass payroll.

Why don't they have sit-ins at the Everywoman's Center or LBGA headquarters? These are places where militant elitists are supposed to go when they feel like taking over a building. I just hope the protestors in Memorial Hall let the Telefund people in to work.

Should you put sit-in participation on your resume? We should all storm the Mather Career Center and demand that they recommend doing so.

Imagine, instead of basketball coaches being accused of exploiting students, it was middle-aged grad students who hang around just to stir up trouble? "I don't think there's anything wrong with majoring in professional protesting," they would say as they led budding rebels-without-a cause to Whitmore.

Or, if that one went over your head, how 'bout this one: you made it on TV again — great!

What do you expect when all the legislators in Boston see of UMass are groups of nuts who obviously don't go to class or care about their real education, singing "We are the World" while kicking in windows of the student newspaper, all in the name of free speech? Give UMass more money?

Smart-aleck can't have fun

As human beings, we are all idiots. Psychologists claim the average human being uses about 3 percent of his or her brain. You may have questioned it before, but what the capital "I" accounts for the other 97 percent? Does the major part of the brain spend a lifetime figuring out what it should do and never gets around to it? Perhaps there will be a PBS special on "the procrastinating brain." Who knows? In any case, to shed some light on the subject, I became enlightened the other morning when I had a chat with a person who uses 100 percent of their brain.

Kris K.
EARLE

I met the entity while I was skipping rocks at a nearby pond. Dressed in a toga, the being appeared from a cloud of fog, walked across the surface of the water, and stated rather bluntly that it has the answers to all the world's problems. Although it knew innumerable forms of communication, it spoke to me in English, since that is the only language that my little mind could comprehend. It called itself "Chris," although which gender Chris was eluded me.

Chris knew the secrets behind the making of the universe and said that there is other life out there, but much too far away. Chris does not want to waste time spending 300 and two years in a spacecraft, so Chris send an intergalactic postcard saying that we boring humans are located on Earth. I wonder how much the stamps cost.

Chris told me that at 100 percent knowledge, males and females do not need to love each other, hate each other, or have any sort of relationship whatsoever. At the mass knowledge of 100 percent there is little pleasure in sexual gratification. It is a thing of the past to Chris, "a time when men and women were unsatiated brutes."

Chris mentioned that all nuclear armaments and forms of military equipment will bring our ultimate destruction. "This is only because some squalid, 3-percented buffoon might actually have one of those human mood swings and let one fly," Chris sardonically said. Chris thought that nuclear weapons were a good idea otherwise, "sort of like a good chess game." Figure that one out.

Chris knew that there are actually no forms of a believable religion and looked everywhere to find proof. "I am the closest the human race will ever get. I am 100 percent pure," Chris boasted. "Everyone out there is fooling themselves in relying on false pretenses."

I started thinking that Chris was sort of a pompous jerk. A smart, pompous jerk, but my labelling held true otherwise. Fortunately or unfortunately, Chris heard me. "Am not," was the brilliant 100 percent reply.

Chris started to head toward even touchier areas. Chris said the abortion issue was moot because the whole human race will be sterile in less than five years. "This is due to the fluoride in the drinking water and the hot chromosophmorian siding of vector X-12." I did not bother to ask what the hell the preceding meant.

Among the other topics Chris spewed out from his non-stopping orifice were that we will not need leaders in the future and that the human race will be erased from existence by the turn of the century. Chris was a true and optimistic prophet. "The power of 100 percent knowledge is to know all that there is to know," Chris said.

In between the rambling, I managed to ask Chris how he gained all of this wisdom and knowledge.

"Practice. You wouldn't understand," Chris replied, grimacing. The "know-it-all" then vanished into thin air.

I stood in a daze, trying to piece together why it was me that this being came to and stated all these irrepressible thoughts. But at 3-percent knowledge, I could not.

I went back to throwing rocks and got one to skip seven times. I may use only 3 percent of my brain, but I think I am smart enough to know when to kick back and enjoy some of life's simple pleasures.

Black students want to study, not be insulted

I am angry about what happened to Arlens Barosy way before he was attacked a second time, when it finally became too noticeable for the Collegian not to address the racism to which he was subjected. I have a couple of statements to make to the individuals who were involved in both attacks on Arlens and to everybody else who might feel or act the same way toward Black people.

I want everyone to understand that I am not speaking to White students only, that hatred of Black people exists among foreign races too, and I am talking from experience. I live in Knowlton where there are only a few Black students and it is sad to see that some of the residents in our building have already set their minds about Black people based on the way this country has portrayed Black America. They do not even take the time to learn about us and from us. I am asking you to take the time and learn from Arlens now. I also feel that the University plays its role in whatever happens to students of color as well as all racists because in a 200-300 student class size you can only count 4 or 5 students of color. Why aren't more students of color admitted to this school?

The media have always associated us with violence, but anyone who has read the Collegian has to admire Arlens' courage for not being violent when he was attacked. In remaining nonviolent, Arlens handled the situation by embracing Martin Luther King's approach, but let's pray the Lord that there will never be a second Arlens Barosy: he or she may handle such an attack very differently. Black students on this campus take this matter very seriously. We are here to study, not to be insulted with words like "nigger" or to be physically attacked. We will not tolerate such words or behavior and if provoked some of us will fight back. It is time for students of all races to realize that Black students are present on this campus, and we will remain here whether it pleases racists or not.

Union expresses support, solidarity

In light of the most recent attacks on the minority community at the University of Massachusetts, the Executive Board of AFSCME Local 1776 voted unanimously to condemn these acts of violence.

Our union is committed to building both a just workplace and a multicultural community where prejudice, discrimination and violence will not be tolerated. Therefore we call on University administration to urgently and vigorously address the causes of racial violence that we have recently witnessed.

We also offer our solidarity to the members of the University community who have suffered as a result of the intolerance that continues to plague our community.

Dirty Plotte
by Julie Doucet
published by Drawn & Quarterly

Julie Doucet does comics that are not for the faint of heart.

You can tell just by looking at the title — "Plotte" is a French Canadian slang word for female genitalia, whose nearest English equivalent is unprintable in any newspaper available to impressionable young minds.

She writes and draws mostly autobiographical fantasies, short pieces about her dreams, her fears, the bizarre things that happen when she isn't looking. Sex figures prominantly, frequently accompanied by death, or at least mutilation — all handled without a trace of self-consciousness or self-restraint.

In an early story, "My Conscience," Julie — the restrained one, the straight-laced one — is embarassed at the antics of her wild and woolly conscience — climbing all over cars, falling out of her clothes, making lewd and suggestive comments to passing friends — all the things that Julie wants to do herself, but won't. Luckily, Julie's conscience is allowed free reign in her comics.

Her range is enormous. She can effortlessly convey the dark paranoia of a nightmare, as in "At Night, Coming Home," when she returns to her apartment to discover that it has been booby-trapped with guillotines. There's the loopy oddness of the strip in which she levitates herself to the bathroom to avoid spilling a menstrual overflow, or "Charming Periods," a strip in which a penis whines piteously for a taste of Tampax, bringing new meaning to the term "penis envy." And then there's the touching loveliness of another page which is about the quiet beauty of walking home drunk on a snowy night with a lover.

Her work is perhaps only describable with that over-used cliche "simple, yet complex." Even her most charming strips, like "Ballet with my Phone," is filled with an edge of paranoia — her phone cries, "I have the feeling I'm gonna rrr...rring?" and then does, dancing about the room. Julie leaps up to chase it, but feels compelled to copy her phone's every move and dances about with it, dismayed, unable to answer it.

But this paranoia is rarely terrifying — like everything else about her work, it is, and she takes great glee in it. In another strip about a disturbing dream, she awakens from it and wanders about her apartment, which is full of household appliances and kitchenware, all come to life and crying out "Hate hate" and "Here you are bitch" and "Murder!" and "Beat her!" She takes no notice, though, feeding her cat and herself and then sitting down to write in her diary as the animate implements swarm about her.

Like I said, not for the faint of heart. Some will complain, some will react with concern, like the reader who wrote in about "Strip Tease," in which she lovingly dissected a reader who had sent a nude picture of himself to her. "Is it for shock value," he asked, "do you hate men, or did you suffer abuse as a child?" Doucet responds, "I do not hate men (or penises) ha ha no, no abuse as a child. . . I'm just studying the world, in my way, and in that case, just dissecting the penis case!"

In the end, her work is so original it's impossible to say if she is doing something wrong or right. Each issue of Dirty Plotte is an invitation into Doucet's dreams and nightmares, and you can accept it or reject it as you choose.

Sea of Hats ponders hypocrisy with music

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

Whether or not they will turn Amherst into the next Seattle, local band Sea Of Hats definitely made their presence known last Saturday in the Campus Center at Amherst College. The two-hour performance featured tunes the musicians have been working on since last December, most of which focused on themes common to most college students.

Opening with "Televangelists," a song exalting the virtues of some of our favorite TV personalities and soul-guiders, the group sounded a little nervous but maintained a great energy-level. The hard-driving beat and catchy tune uplifted the spirits of the audience so that almost everyone was in that "I-dig-this-tune-but-not-eonugh-to-get-up-and-dance" mood. Chair dancing was big at this point and throughout most of the show, a number of nodding heads and tapping feet constituted most of the audience participation.

Among my favorites was "They Smell the Fear," a song illustrating the experience of minors getting served and the gut-wrenching ordeal of using a fake ID for the first time. This tune was a bit more low-key than most of the other material and more deviant from the familiar structure of many songs performed.

"I Want My Foreskin Back," an upbeat tune that I just couldn't help singing along with (despite the fact that I could not really empathize in light of the subject matter) illustrated

Sophie's Choice is this week's video pick

By ADAM SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Staff

Of all the films that Quick Flix has delivered to my dorm for my reviews Sophie's Choice by far struck me as one of the finest films I've ever seen. The early '80s Alan J. Pakula film has a fantastic cast starring Meryl Streep, Peter MacNicol, and Kevin Kline (who stars in Pakula's latest flick Consenting Adults.)

The actors' abilities and Pakula's directing appear on screen to be a more than perfect combination, something that is vital to a film that wants to come across as realistic. My choice for this week's video pick is Sophie's Choice.

Of all the Kevin Kline performances that I have seen I feel that Sophie's Choice enabled the Indiana University and Julliard graduate to really show his stuff. Kline's character acts like he's on top of the world, when in fact he is a very depressed aggravated man.

Sophie's Choice takes the viewer back in time to post-war Brooklyn in 1947. There is a story within a story in this film (are you still with me on that?). On the surface, the story is about a young southern writer, Stingo (Peter MacNicol) that ventures to New York on what he calls "a voyage of discovery." There he makes close friends with his neighbors Sophie (Meryl Streep) and Nathan (Kevin Kline) who live in the apartment upstairs. The three-way friendship becomes a love triangle.

The underlying or secondary story revolves around Sophie's past. On the surface her distinct Polish accent, her blonde curls, and her sweet foreign smile hide who she really is. Her unhappiness with herself, the scars on her wrists, and the tatooed numbers on her left arm tell another story about this woman.

"Here I am, a nice Jewish boy pushing 50, I fall in love with a polish shiksa (Yiddish for a non-Jewish woman)," seems comical when Nathan speaks about Sophie. She loves him, but has lied to him. The way Sophie describes her father as a man that was killed for helping the Jews made me feel he was a better man for giving his life to save Jews when he was not a Jew himself. "My father was a civilized man, living in an uncivilized time. . . the civilized were the first to die." But the truth is revealed that her father in fact was no friend of the Jews, he was a professor in Cracow who lectured on how to exterminate the Jews.

The words that flow from Meryl Streep's mouth seem to be coming somewhere else besides the script (whether it be from Holocaust survivors or personal experiences). Whatever the source she pulls you in so close that you are able to feel her pain and it seems that she is sitting in front of you. This remarkable performance adds to the vivacious actress' resume as yet another powerful performance.

In a series of flashbacks, Sophie describes the truth about her father to Stingo, whom she has emotionally "bonded" with. She was typing a speech for her father about Poland's Jewish problem when she stumbled upon a word that she didn't know. The word was 'extermination.' Her father's solution to Poland's Jewish problem was extermination. That day, she said, she visited the Jewish ghetto and couldn't understand why her father wanted to exterminate the Jews. She had no courage to question what her father was lecturing on. Her husband and father turned on her. Before she knew it she was being sent to Aushwitz with her two children and that is when she said to Stingo, "I knew Christ had turned his back on me."

Towards the end, Stingo proclaims his love for Sophie and asks her to marry him and mother his children. She tells him "no" because she wouldn't make a good mother. In a moving flashback Sophie describes her arrival at the death camp. A Nazi yelled at her and wanted to take her children from her. He forced her to choose which of her children must die. She yelled in German "I can't choose."

Trust me, I'd love to ruin the secondary story's ending, but I won't. As for the surface story's ending, it too, is a shocker. But hey, I'll be nice this time. So if you want to know what Sophie's choice is, make your own choice to view, Sophie's Choice.

the ups and downs of circumcision for a college-age, Jewish male. I could almost designate this song as the culturally diverse portion of the program, and although it's a stretch, it was the closest thing to "ethnicity" within the four posh walls of Amherst College's Frontroom.

A unique acoustic segment of the show gave guitar player/vocalist John Rudolph a chance to exhibit his skill within both musical arenas. With "Love Will Tear Us Apart," Rudolph displayed a more serious and therefore versatile musical talent. The downright silly, clap-along "Take A Lot of Drugs" concluded the acoustic portion of the performance, and returned to the lighthearted tone of the rest of the show.

"There's No Christmas Anymore," "The Balding Song" a.k.a. "Shiny Unhappy People," and "Holiday Screw" were crowd favorites. The seven-minute "Musings of the Elder Prometheus" (a change from the usual two-minute, short-but-to-the-point pieces by the band) incorporated costumes (kind of) and the band's idea of totally free musical expression.

In addition to the incredible talent of Rudolph, the energy of drummer Matt Walker added quality and quantity to the overall stage presence of the three-member band.

Still seemingly in the process of learning how to play his bass, Jesse Fuchs did a good job keeping up with the two more experienced musicians. He also did wonders for "Musings of the Elder Prometheus" donning a multicolored jester's hat and collar, and adding to the vocals of this piece.

All in all Sea of Hats gave a good show, and I'll probably find myself humming some of their songs while trudging across campus or painting my nails.

I have to give Sea of Hats credit in one major area where it is no doubt due. Much of their show reminded me of one of my all-time favorite bands, Spinal Tap. Having seen Tap in concert this summer, I have a new appreciation for the silly antics of such on-stage farce and sarcasm. In true Tap form, Sea of Hats taunted every aspect of our sometimes juvenile existence as college students.

Throwing Muses to perform

ROLAND COGGIN
Collegian Staff

The Throwing Muses come to Northampton to play the Iron Horse Tuesday night and you want to see them, even if you don't know it yet.

The Muses have been around for a long time and they've always been cool, but not too many people have heard of them. They sure aren't the household name Barry Manilow is, yet. But that's not the way to judge a band, because not too many people liked Beethoven until he was dead, you know?

Playing a style that is completely your own won't usually win popularity, just a lot of love from a few people if you are as good as the Throwing Muses. They effortlessly blend acoustic and electric guitars, crazy percussion, occasional strings or samples, and dreamy folk-inspired lyrics and it always ends up sounding like no one but them.

Yesterday someone called me and the first thing she said was "Hey, you're listening to the Muses!" For a band like them, that's cooler than having gold records to hang on their apartment walls.

The Throwing Muses have gone through many lineup changes (most notably Tanya Donelly taking off to record an excellent album with a band called Belly), but they keep doing their thing. The latest album, "Red Heaven" on Sire Records is beautiful to listen to; it's their most modern sounding, with noisier guitar parts that still fit their style.

Kristen Hersh has handled the leading role well, putting out an album that will excite fans instead of having them wish for the old Muses.

The Flaming Lips open the show; they are a little angrier than the Muses, I think. Hopefully they'll leave some of the stage standing for the rest of the evening.

The Iron Horse is a nice place to see the Throwing Muses. Its old wood and folky restaurant atmosphere suits the Muses better than dusty beer soaked basements; you can even enjoy dinner before the show to make for a swanky Tuesday night.

The Throwing Muses will perform Tuesday, Oct. 20 at 7 p.m. at the Iron Horse in Northampton.

Another UMass band tastes success

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

When you recite the birth places of music talent, Seattle and Atlanta come to mind. But how about the University of Massachusetts? One Eyed Jake, a rock band, is yet another band breaking into the big time from the hallowed towers of Southwest.

Steve Brenner, lead and rhythm guitar player for One Eyed Jake, is the last of the band's members to graduate. Tom McGrath, on percussion and harmonica, Avrum Heafitz, on Tenor Sax and backing vocals, and Brenner have been together for four years. "Completely nuts" Bob Mullins, lead vocalist, and "classical" Brooks Holmes on trumpet, round out the band.

"We'll always be a UMass band, but now we're trying to get a base in Boston. That way we'll sound a little more credible than being labeled 'just another college band,'" says Brenner.

This last summer was a whirlwind of unbelievable success for this local band. Beginning with Harvey Wharfield's "Boston Music Showcase" in which Wharfield played the band's CD repeatedly, One Eyed Jake went on to headline at the Paradise in Boston.

"For some reason Nightstage cancelled out on its whole performance. We ended up headlining at the Paradise. The first time we played the Paradise, we headlined. It was a huge crowd and they loved us," says Brenner, months later, still wide-eyed with disbelief. The band was even contacted by Star Search, Brenner said.

"From there we played the 'Best of Boston' series at Great Woods. It was amazing. There were probably about four to five thousand people there. And a huge stage. We were getting announced on WBCN and WCGY at the same time. It was just a great time. We got a lot of exposure from that and a lot of people heard of us," says Brenner. "It was a showcase for bands, and all the record companies came down."

A few days after the Great Woods performance the band was contacted by Asahi National Broadcasting, who wants the band to tour in Japan next year. And One Eyed Jake is the ultimate American Rock n' Roll band, all of its members clean shaven, short haired, denim wearing, all-around-good-guys. It's easy to see how this band's looks alone could make them a marketable target for the Japanese scouting agency.

And yet, they're talented too! The band is rumored to be actively pursued by a Columbia records subsidiary and Capitol records, where if they were signed, they would be recorded with another Boston band on the same album.

As for the band's future plans, Brenner says, "The Hadley Pub was always nice to us. We'd do something again with them. Otherwise we'll pretty much stick around Boston, do the record deal, and get rich and famous." Brenner laughs, "That's my plan, anyways."

One Eyed Jake will perform the Pi Kappa Alpha (PIKE) fraternity's Halloween party on Oct. 31.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A lesson in living comes your way. At first, you may not know how to handle it. The results prove instructive for the future. Do not let a family quarrel get out of hand.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Keep a low profile until you see how things really stand. A misunderstanding could upset the balance of power at your place of employment. Clear things up quickly before a war breaks out.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Cultivate an individual whose experience would mesh well with your own. Teamwork brings speedy success. Better financial planning will make it easier for you to pay monthly bills.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Do whatever is necessary to get a job done right. Although travel may be inconvenient, it could put you in line for a large financial payout. Your sense of humor comes in handy.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Knowing your strengths and shortcomings helps you apply for the right job. Be realistic in your self-appraisal. Use shopping pages to plan money-saving family needs.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Resist an early-morning temptation to take a chance in business or community affairs. What seems like a sure-fire solution to a delicate matter may not work out as expected.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You could encounter red tape and delay this morning. Keep your temper in check. Once you calm down, you will probably think of an alternative. Bury the hatchet with loved one.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Children are drawn to you. Be more open and affectionate. Your considerable charm helps you promote a favorite charity. Public entertainment holds extra appeal tonight.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Trust your intuition when it warns you of potential danger. Do-it-yourself types save money if they work hard. Bargains abound for comparison shoppers.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A good sense of humor will help you weather some difficult hours. Success depends on your willingness to change. Rigid, stubborn thinking can cost you a job or romantic partner.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A relocation is possible. Apply for a passport. Avoiding opportunistic people will save you both time and emotional distress. Romance seems sweeter the second time around!

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Reread your mail; you could have missed something. Lightening your work load gives your more time for creative projects. Criticizing others will not bring the results you seek.

Food expert to address UM luncheon fundraiser

Patricia Wells, award-winning cookbook author and former food writer for the New York Times and the Washington Post, will speak Monday at the University of Massachusetts at a luncheon to raise money for the David A. Booth Scholarship Fund.

Booth taught in the department of political science for 24 years. Besides being a distinguished scholar and beloved professor, Booth had a passionate interest in French cuisine — not just in the eating but in the preparation as well.

He frequently vacationed in France and returned with new recipes. He died in 1991. The scholarship will benefit political science students.

Wells, who has lived in France for over 10 years, is one of the world's most respected authorities on French cooking. In her career as a journalist, an award-winning author of four best-selling cookbooks, and one of France's leading restaurant critics, Patricia Wells, has taught food lovers around the world to enjoy the hidden treasures of French food.

An American, Wells is the first foreigner and only woman to have served as restaurant critic for the French newsweekly, L'Express. Wells will also be one of six featured women chefs participating in "Books and Cooks," the United Way fundraiser on Oct. 20 in Northampton.

People attending the luncheon will receive a paperback copy of Well's "Bistro Cooking," with 200 recipes inspired by the neighborhood restaurants in France.

The luncheon menu, which came from the book, includes seasoned couscous salad on lettuce greens, French bread, Tante Yvonne's tossed salad with vinaigrette, Le Petit Truc's chicken with tarragon vinegar, potato quarters sauteed in their skins and chocolate mousse.

Ending men's violence

60 rally to condemn domestic abuse

By STACY MALONE
Collegian Staff

People came together to sing songs, hold signs and speak out against violence at a demonstration to end men's violence at the Unitarian Church in Northampton Saturday.

"In order to address a problem, you have to speak out against it and take a stand," said Stan Rosenberg, the state senator for Amherst, "this is an opportunity to speak out against domestic violence."

As speakers condemned domestic violence in front of an estimated 60 people gathered on the Unitarian Church's front lawn, some held handmade signs saying "Stop the Violence Against Our Sisters" and "Never Another Battered Woman." Between speakers, the men, women and children sang together against domestic violence.

The Men's Resource Center in Amherst sponsored the demonstration. Center Director Steve Botkin, said the third Saturday in October has been set aside for about six years to speak out about men's violence in our lives, our families and communities.

"We need to make a visible and loud public statement about men's violence against women," Botkin said. "We need for men to see other men doing this."

Botkin continued, "We are socialized into a culture where violence against women is normal."

He said men are afraid to recognize themselves as perpetrator and abusers of women. "Because of our fear, we are afraid of breaking the silence of our violence and afraid of not being real men.

"Together, in our anger and action we can develop a community of peace," Botkin said.

Veronica Frenkel, a formerly battered Latina woman working in the Educator/Advocate Program at the Everywomen's Center, said she desires a safer world to live in.

Frenkel said she would like a world in which she does not have to pick up a newspaper and see a woman has been killed by her partner, she wished she could walk down the street without being whistled or jeered at and wished she could get in her car without having to check the back seat.

"We can all start with ourselves and make a personal commitment to end the violence against women," Frenkel said.

She said in order to stop men's violence against women men need to resist sexist attitudes and challenge those of others, stop making or laughing at jokes that degrade women and refuse to rent or buy pornography.

Frenkel also said men need to challenge abusive behavior when they see it, find healthy and constructive ways to handle their anger and make a conscious commitment to find some alternative to violence and teach children healthy, respectable nonviolent behavior.

"Women hold up half the sky" is a saying Frenkel she liked. "I need you men to join in against violence against women because only together can we hold up the sky," Frenkel said.

"I was just the lucky one today," Ingoglia said. "Gaining yards is a team effort, and the offensive line did their part and I just happened to come up with my end of the bargain."

UMass opened the scoring in the first quarter, as Ingoglia dove in from the one yard line capping a 10-play, 94-yard drive that put the Minutemen up 7-0.

Ingoglia's score would hold up until early in the fourth quarter as UConn threatened to score twice, both times being turned away by the ferocious UMass defense.

The Huskies best chance to score came late in the third quarter, when UConn took over at the UMass 16 yard line after an Andrew McNeilly fumble.

UConn would drive to the Minuteman seven yard line, before a fourth and one run over right tackle was stuffed by inside linebackers Bobby Burke and Phil Lartigue for a one yard loss.

"We knew in the huddle that there was no way they were getting that [first down]," said Assencoa. "They ran it to the other side of me, and Phil put a hit on [Ed] Long that they're hearing back in Connecticut."

Four minutes later, McNeilly went around left end on the keeper, putting the Minutemen up 14-0 and essentially slamming the door on UConn's victory hopes.

UConn's next possession saw DeSarno cough up the ball on the Husky 24 yard line after enduring a bone crushing lick by a blitzing Mario Perry.

Tom Fasano, filling in for the injured McNeilly (minor concussion), muscled his way in from the one yard line three minutes later, putting UMass up 20-0 as the two point conversion try by Ron Drapeau failed.

The Huskies finally got on the board with three minutes left, as Long burst through from the two, capping a six play, 75 yard, penalty-laden drive for the 20-7 final.

The victory moves the Minutemen to 4-1 (3-1 in the Yankee Conference) while the Huskies drop to 2-4 (1-2 YanCon). UMass is tied for third in the YanCon with Villanova, who travel to Amherst this Saturday.

Field hockey wins two on road

Minutewomen defeat Villanova and Rhode Island

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team won two road games this weekend in contrasting fashion, slipping past Villanova University 2-1 in sudden death double overtime on Friday, and pummeling the University of Rhode Island squad by a 6-0 count Sunday.

When UMass took the field in Philadelphia on Friday, they were well aware of how good the Wildcats (9-5) were, but had no idea of how physical they would be.

"Let's put it this way," UMass head coach Pam Hixon said. "This was the most physical contest I've ever been involved in in my life. If Villanova didn't get the ball, they'd get a piece of us. There wasn't a lot of flow to the game, and their players received yellow and green cards."

The two teams traded penalty corner goals in the first half, Villanova's by Staci Verzera at 28:22 and UMass' at 21:52 by Ainslee Press. From that point until the end of regulation, UMass did nothing to break the 1-1 tie.

"They took us out of our game early, and we struggled to get back in it," Hixon said. "Kathy Phelan was our catalyst in overtime, though. She just went on the attack, and made lots of passes. She was the player of the game."

After a scoreless first overtime period, UMass took advantage of Villanova's excessive physical play. When Tara Jelley broke free after taking a perfect feed from Press, she had a breakaway until two Wildcats tackled her from behind. Officials awarded UMass a penalty stroke, and Press easily beat goaltender Chrissy Thomas for the game winning goal.

Sunday's matchup was less strenuous for the Minutewomen (14-1), who travelled to Kingston, Rhode Island to take on their Atlantic-10 foe Rhode Island. Two first half goals on penalties by Press, along with a penalty corner by Natalie Hart, gave UMass a 3-0 lead.

In the second half, forwards Jenn Salisbury (two goals) and Danielle Borges finished up the scoring.

Minutemen stick it to Huskies, 20-7

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

Linebacker Scott Assencoa, shown here sacking UConn's Tom DeSarno, had a hellacious day in UMass' 20-7 win. Assencoa led the defense with five sacks and seven tackles.

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

Led by the running of freshmen phenom Rene Ingoglia and the defensive clinic put on by outside linebacker Scott Assencoa, the University of Massachusetts football team rolled over the University of Connecticut 20-7 before a Homecoming crowd of 10,909 Saturday at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

"We prepared really well for this game, and it was just a great show of determination by our guys," said UMass head coach Mike Hodges. "I've been here for 14 years, and this was probably the best defensive effort I've seen."

Assencoa's five sacks of Husky quarterbacks Tom DeSarno and Tony Valente set the defensive tone for the day, as the UMass defense tightened time and time again.

The Minutemen allowed the Huskies just 180 yards in total offense, shutting down the potent UConn offense while making a mockery of the entire Husky offensive line.

"The [UMass] defense was great today," said UConn head coach Tom Jackson. "Our offensive line stunk and our quarterback stunk. They [the UMass defense] were probably holding a lottery in the huddle to see who would get the next sack."

Offensively, the Minutemen were led by the 138 yard, 22 carry performance of Bolstered by his return to a more familiar position, as well as the stellar play of his defensive mates, University of Massachusetts outside linebacker Scott Assencoa played his finest collegiate game, compiling five sacks (four in the first half), seven tackles and two pass deflections.

Assencoa had moved to inside linebacker for the first three games to replace teammate Bobby Burke. With the return of Burke two weeks ago, Assencoa was able to slide over to his more familiar outside backer position and responded with his first five sacks of the season.

"We had all the right calls at the right time," said Assencoa. "The coverage by our defensive backs was great and everyone else was doing their job — this freed me up to pressure the quarterback."

"Pressure the quarterback" is a bit of an understatement, as Assencoa's sacks resulted in a total of 30 yards lost for the UConn offense, as well as some very creative, made-for-television sack dances. A few of his hits are still being heard back in Storrs.

"I've been around this game 25 years — 14 years at this place — and that's as good a defensive performance as I've seen," said head coach Mike Hodges. "The performance by Scott was just great though — you can't ask for much more than that."

The 6-foot-2, 212 junior from Natick, Mass. evolved quickly in 1990 when he arrived here and became a starter at outside linebacker. He started nine games that year and has yet to relinquish that position on one of the most potent defensive forces in the Yankee Conference.

"The guys, the personalities, the friendship, we're such a close-knit unit that when it comes to a fourth-and-one, we look at each other and say, 'OK, let's do it,'" said Assencoa.

Other defensive standouts for the Minutemen were outside backer Mario Perry, who added to his sack total with one for a 12-yard loss, as well as five tackles and two pass deflects. Defensive tackle Brian Corcoran was impressive as well, as he compiled six tackles and one sack, and inside linebacker Phil Lartigue added to his team lead in tackles with seven yesterday against the Huskies.

Free safety Matt Rajotte and cornerback Don Caparotti also played well, as they each had one interception.

"The defense gave the offense opportunities all day to score," said Hodges. "Luckily, the offense took advantage of those opportunities."

Next week, the defense will face its toughest opponent of the season when the Villanova Wildcats travel the Amherst. Will the defense be able to duplicate this week's performance?

"Our motto is play hard for 60 minutes, and we did that against UConn," said Assencoa. "Now it's time to set our sights on Villanova and play just as hard."

Johnson and Jacobs. It sounds like a law firm, but this potent offensive tandem led the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team (8-4-1, 4-1-1 in Atlantic 10) to two overtime victories over St. Joseph's 4-2, and Hofstra 5-2 at Garber Field this weekend.

On Friday, UMass defeated A-10 foe St. Joe's 4-2 behind Colin Johnson's two scores in overtime. The freshman put the Minutemen ahead with his third goal of the year when he took a pass from junior Justin Edelman and put it past the diving Sean Vliet, goalie of the Hawks.

UMass got on the board early in the second half when freshman Brad Miller assisted on Hossein Giahi's first goal of the year, giving Sam Koch's team a 1-0 lead.

At 58:40, junior forward Don D'Ambra tied the game at 1-1 for the Hawks with assists from sophomores John Sharp and Michael Feite.

However, UMass would strike again when junior Randy Jacobs scored the first of his three goals for the weekend, putting them ahead of the Hawks 2-1.

Jacobs blasted a pass from co-captain Shawn Bleau into the upper right corner of the net, leaving Vliet sprawled out on the ground.

Even though Sam Koch's team came away with an important victory, there was some disheartening news for UMass, because the Minutemen lost Bleau for the season. The inspirational midfielder suffered a broken leg in a collision with a St. Joe's defender, which was questioned as a cheap shot.

"Shawn means so much to this team, and now we have to pick it up a notch. It is going to be tough," said Matt Edgerly after the victory over St. Joe's.

This was the attitude of the team as it entered yesterday's non-conference matchup with Hofstra University. The Minutemen honored their injured leader by having Edgerly wear Bleau's number 15 jersey.

Coach Koch looked for Edgerly to fill some of the void left by Bleau's absence. The game ended with an emotional 5-2 win for UMass, as Jacobs ignited a three-goal outburst in the overtime period.

Early in the overtime, Jacobs stole a pass from a Hofstra defender that was intended for keeper Craig Dempster. He faked right with the ball and put it in on the short side for the goal, giving UMass the lead at 3-2.

Jacobs added a goal later in the period for his second of the game. He also combined with Johnson for UMass' first goal, totaling six on the weekend for the tandem.

"Two wins in a row and we're excited. Our team was in a slump and hopefully now we are coming out of it. Looking ahead to UConn (3:00 p.m. Wednesday at Garber Field), it's going to be tough, but we will be ready," said Johnson.

Other UMass goal scorers: Tomas Johansson and Dave Yurick also scored for the Minutemen against the Flying Dutchmen. Freshman Brad Miller had two assists on the weekend for UMass.

Negotiations said to be beneficial

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

Progress was made after a three-hour private meeting Saturday between minority students and top administrators at the University of Massachusetts, according to Marty Walsh, one of the mediators at the session.

"Everyone is very positive," said Marty Walsh, the regional director of the Justice Department's Community Relations Service. "And I hope it continues," said Walsh, who said both parties left with a sense of optimism that progress was made.

Student leaders and administrators, including UMass president Michael Hooker, have agreed to work out their differences in mediation administered by the Boston regional office of the U.S. Justice Department's Community Relations Service. The free service sponsored by the department provides conflict-resolution in racial disputes.

The department got involved last week to mediate the dispute between UMass minority students and administrators. Since a recent assault on a black residence assistant, which led to racial grafitti, threats and other incidents, students have been concerned about their safety.

Last week Chancellor Richard O'Brien announced a plan to combat the racial problems on campus. Actions executed last week include the allocation of $250,000 annually to replace the loss of funds for Upward Bound, the funding of a review of the loss of the program and the allocation of funds to appoint 20 new personnel to address security concerns.

Due to negotiation ground rules, Walsh, or anyone at the meeting can not comment on the substance of the session.

Ricardo Townes, an associate dean from academic support services, who was present at the meeting, said the meeting sets a significant precedent because it's the first time students are working face to face with the policy makers.

"I can't over emphasize enough the significance of the President of the school [Hooker] meeting directly with the students," said Townes. "It's hard to convince people who are somewhat removed that this should change things. This is the first year students of color have not been disconnected with the policy makers."

Townes said he hopes the relationship between the students and the policy makers continues and the climate for students of color is improved.

Bush, Clinton clash on taxes; Perot cites outsider background

By TERENCE HUNT
Associated Press

EAST LANSING, Mich. — In a jousting, climatic campaign debate Monday night, President Bush predicted Bill Clinton would "sock it to the middle class" if elected president. Clinton pledged point blank: "I am not going to raise taxes on the middle class to pay" for his initiatives.

Fifteen days from the election, the fur was flying — so much that at one point Bush suggested Clinton's home-state of Arkansas was the "lowest of the low," drawing a quick and passionate defense from the five-term governor.

Ross Perot, the third man on the debate stage, stressed his non-politician's background in pledging to work on economic and other problems. He said he was spending $60 million of his own fortune on his independent bid for the White House.

"Tonight is just the beginning," Perot said, then giving the program schedule for a series of campaign ads to come.

Bush played the role of the aggressor throughout the 90-minute debate, charging that on issues as diverse as free trade and the draft, Clinton had a pattern of "trying to have it all ways."

Clinton, the front runner on the debate griddle, said that Abraham Lincoln, too, had once opposed a war. He said he could send Americans into battle if necessary to protect the nation's interests, pointing out that Woodrow Wilson and Franklin Roosevelt had done so without having served in uniform.

Analysts discount 1962 CIA missile sightings in Cuba

By RUTH SINAI
Associated Press

LANGLEY, VA. - The CIA had 25 agents reporting from Cuba during the 1962 missile crisis that brought the world to the brink of nuclear war.

Intelligence analysts in Washington discounted their reports of seeing what looked like huge missile-like tubes, believing the Soviet military buildup in Cuba was purely defensive.

"The record of intelligence is not unblemished in this crisis," Deputy CIA Director Adm. William O. Studeman said Monday during an unprecedented seminar at CIA headquarters.

The compilation of documents includes notes taken by then-agency director John McCone during White House crisis meetings, estimates by the intelligence community, reports from Cuban agents, and memoranda coded Ironbark — meaning they were based on information from one of the most valuable Soviet espies of the Cold War, Col. Oleg Penkovsky.

If the CIA could do it over, Studeman said, it would pay more attention to the informants reporting sightings of Soviet missiles in Cuba, and analyze better how the Soviets viewed deployment of missiles outside their borders.

The documents and reminiscences highlight how the United States nearly missed the deployment of the SS-4 medium-range missiles in Cuba until it was almost too late.

The deployment only became known when a U-2 spy plane photographed the launch pads on the western third of Cuba on Oct. 14.

Warren Frank, then with the agency's foreign intelligence branch, said much of the Cuban agent reporting was collected in Miami at what became the largest CIA station in the world.

The 300-member station collected reports from some 25 agents on the island, interviewed Cuban refugees, and talked to emigres in regular touch with their families.

One report declassified Monday was made Sept. 17, 1962 by a 47-year-old

Olver: Clinton to win

Bush debate effort not strong enough

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

President Bush failed to make the strong effort he needed in last night's final presidential debate to allow him to overcome Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton on Nov. 3, according to Congressman John Olver and approximately 50 students who watched last night's debate in Lewis Residence Hall.

Following the debate, students participated in a discussion with Olver led by UMass history professor Bruce Laurie as part of a debate party sponsored by the University Democrats and Residential Education.

Olver, who represents Amherst as part of the First Congressional District, said he believed Bush would do whatever he needs to do to get re-elected.

"Bush distorted repeatedly — he will say anything to win," Olver said.

Olver said he thought it was ironic that Bush spent much of the debate accusing Clinton of favoring the growth of government when the Reagan and Bush administrations have experienced large growth in the public sector.

Sophomore communications major Josh Eilberg, who is uncommitted, said he thought Bush "put his foot in his mouth" in answering a question about the role of women and minorities in his campaign.

After giving examples of women holding high positions in government, including U.S. Labor Secretary Lynn Martin and Trade Representative Carla Hills, Bush said he hopes most of the women running for office "lose, because most of them are liberal Democrats."

Bush drew a number of groans after his statement and after he said he respected Ross Perot's decision to admit his mistake in dropping out of the presidential race earlier this year. Clinton drew the greatest applause, particularly during his closing statement and when he said he would be in charge of the nation's economy if elected president.

Sophomore history major Matthias Brown said he is voting for Clinton because the thinks the Arkansas governor can change the direction the U.S. took during the past 12 years of Republican leadership.

"The Republicans have ravaged this country over the last 12 years," Brown

No testing for health workers

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — A state commission recommended Monday against mandatory AIDS testing for health care workers, opting instead for universal precautions, education, counseling and innovative insurance plans.

The commission was chaired by Public Health Commissioner David Mulligan and Assistant Consumer Affairs Secretary Stephen Wallace.

The commission was set up in 1991 after Congress required all states to comply with recommendations from the Centers for Disease Control regarding health care worker to patient disease transmission.

Mulligan said the commission recommended against mandatory testing for several reasons.

"Number one, what would the test really prove?" Mulligan said. He explained there generally is a six-month period between exposure to the AIDS virus and a positive test result.

Instead of protecting patients, he said, a mandatory test program could lull providers and patients into a false sense of security.

"If you get into mandatory testing, it may be more difficult to find health care workers to work in high-risk settings," Mulligan added, citing another reason against it.

The other reason against mandatory testing, Mulligan said, was cost.

Since there has been only one proven case of patients contracting AIDS through a health care worker, the chances of preventing infection through mandatory testing are extremely low, Mulligan said.

That one case involved a Florida dentist who had five patients diagnosed with AIDS. Experts feel improper sterilization of equipment may have been responsible for the infections. The dentist was HIV-positive and later died.

The report recommended that health care workers who are at risk for HIV-infection, either through work-related reasons or because of personal behavior, are tested.

Bicycle Co-op asset to bikers

RSO allows students to fix bikes for cheap prices

CHRISTOPHER EVANS / COLLEGIAN

By TROY L. MERRICK
Collegian Correspondent

In the back hallway of the Student Union is a small room many students are probably unaware of, which could be beneficial to them.

This hidden organization is the Bicycle Co-op, a non-profit business. With the growing population of bikes on campus and the inevitable need for an occasional repair, Matt Germino and his shop are all the more important.

"Historically, the bike co-op has been a loosely-run business plagued by inconsistent open hours, inadequate tool supply, and lack of publicity," said Germino, head of the co-op.

The premise of the place is relatively simple. One merely hauls his or her bike into the shop, and, using the array of tools hanging on the wall, can go to work him or herself. The room also has vices to hold the bike frame in place while the patron repairs the bike gears, for example.

Often the staff will provide helpful advice as to what the problem is and decide whether the part is worth repairing or replacing altogether. Germino said the co-op charges 50 cents for using the shop for 15 minutes and $1 for any time over 15 minutes.

This element can help a person avoid being prey to a bike shop, who would likely charge hefty prices. The co-op also sells replacement parts such as tubes, tires and chains at a reduced rate and can order a variety of specialized parts from supply chains like Trek, Service Cycle and United Tool.

Several students have been associated with keeping the co-op open, but the lack of publicity and support by the Center of Student Businesses caused many to leave.

It was only recently that student Peter Diplock of the Center showed some interest in the facility and initiated a lot of the big changes in inventory, payroll and the business organization, according to Germino.

Germino said this helped the entire well-being of the co-op, as a severe lack of hands in keeping it open caused the inopportune business hours and was making

Chinese official urges students to return home

By GEORGE ZHU
Collegian Correspondent

In a meeting with a group of Chinese students at the University Friday night, Shukang Yang, an Education Consul at the Chinese Consulate in New York, reiterated Chinese government's call for overseas students to return "no matter what their political beliefs were."

Yang's speech, the first in three years by a Chinese consular official, was sponsored by the Chinese Students and Scholars Association at the University. It came almost four months after a new governing council of the Association was elected.

"We encourage all Chinese students and scholars to go back to China after completing their study here," said Yang. "Even for those who once committed some wrongdoings, they are as well welcome."

Yang appealed to overseas students to join China's ongoing reform and economic construction, adding, "Vast Chinese students are patriotic."

"We encourage all Chinese students and scholars to go back to China after completing their study here."
Shukang Yang, Chinese Consulate

Yang said an official document was issued by the Chinese State Council in late August which details a nine-point regulation concerning students studying abroad.

Yang, formerly a faculty member at the Northwestern Polytechnic University in Xi'an, China, began his four year tenure six months ago at the Chinese Consulate in New York city, which deals with consular affairs in the New England area.

Among other things, the Consulate is in charge of issuing and extending passports for Chinese nationals. It also at times provides some domestic movies and videotapes to local Chinese student organizations.

Yang said students with private passports and exchange visitor's visa may apply to waive the two year home country residence requirement.

To do so, the student must submit an application and a certification letter from his Foreign Student Office or U.S. employers to the Chinese Consulate, according to Yang.

"For some reasons some students cannot return home for the time being," Yang said. "But we hope they nevertheless keep in touch with their counterparts in China and contribute to China's science and technology."

Yu Wang, President of the Chinese student association, said his group "is independent and willing to cooperate with the Chinese officials."

"We want to improve our working methods," Wang said. "Everybody is encouraged to join our organization."

He said by paying $10 per year membership fee one can enjoy various privileges such as free Chinese food, parties as well as 10 percent discount at Panda East restaurant in Amherst. The contact person of the Chinese association is Fan Wu at 546-4937.

Local businesses give state economic advice

By DANIEL BOUCHER
Collegian Correspondent

Local business and town officials voiced their advice for the economy yesterday at the Pioneer Valley Regional Conference for Governor Weld's economic development plan.

The Donahue Institute, a public service and outreach unit of the University of Massachusetts president's office, cooperated with the state Executive Office of Economic Development to host four separate panels, which were held in the Campus Center. The panel heard views and recommendations of what the state can do to improve the economic picture for Pioneer Valley.

Michael Hooker, president of the University of Massachusetts, said, "The world's economy is changing rapidly and radically." He said he sees a shift of an economy based from energy to one based on knowledge and information. He said universities play an important role as knowledge factories. "The current recession has also magnified this structural shift taking place," said Hooker.

Hooker said, "The challenge for regions is to get in front of the curve of change to discern the rules that still need to be written."

Lieutenant Governor Paul Cellucci said, "The administration recognizes how critical (the higher education system) is to our economic development." He asked the attendants to explain "What kind of things can we do, infrastructure and investment, that will help the Pioneer Valley economy?"

The panels considered attitudes about capital & credit, education & training, infrastructure, and regulations.

Katharine Sloan, the president of Greenfield Community College, said the Education & Training meeting determined Education is economic development.

"There is no such thing as economic development without a strongly supported K through 12 and higher education system," she said. Recommendations include an increased investment in education, alternatives for property taxes for the financial support of schools, and flexible proposals for individual communities.

The panel also said the community college and technical school system is underutilized. Andrew Scibelli, president of the Springfield Technical Community College, said, "The state needs to look at

Press fights nutrition

Expert says media discourages health

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

The media is having a war on food, according to an award winning French food expert Particia Wells, who spoke to the press yesterday in the Campus Center.

In addition to writing a famous French gourmet recipe book, Simply French, she has written for the New York Times, Washington Post, and L'Express, which is a nationally known Parisian paper in France.

"I don't feel the American press helps in understanding nutrition," Wells said.

Since the media affects the way we look at our lives, Wells finds the media's negative coverage of food to be disturbing. The press coverage on the nutrition value of milk is discouraging, Wells believes. Young children in France are raised on milk. When they get older they drink less milk, but they consume large amounts of cheese. Wells says cheese and milk are healthy.

"We sit down at the table. We have all these negative thoughts," Wells said. "What we do is compensate by over-eating."

Instead of the press jumping on every new study about the negative effects of food, Wells prefers the media to print positive news stories about the nutritional value of food.

"[We should] have a sense of where food comes from," . Wells said. "Most people don't know what a whole chicken looks like. Give us more human attachment to food; individuals making a living at creating steak."

"If we can get behind getting rid of smoking, we can have a 'food is positive' campaign."

Wells said Americans tend to look at food as more of a necessity which takes up part of their busy schedule than looking at it as a pleasurable part of their life. The French, on the other hand, look forward to meals. They find food to be a relaxing part of their day.

"[The press] should pay more attention to our attitude towards food. Pleasure of food is not part of our culture," Wells said.

With a little bit of ingenuity, it is easy to make an nutritious and delicious

The two men debated over issues as diverse as trade to auto efficiency standards to the banking system in the final debate of the campaign, but the sharpest exchanges came over the economy and Bush's attempt to raise doubts about Clinton's trustworthiness.

Mocking Bush's announcement that James A. Baker III would take command of domestic policy initiatives in a second Bush term, Clinton said that in his administration, the person "responsible for the economic policy will be Bill Clinton."

Bush broke in swiftly: "That's what worries me. He's going to be responsible."

Bush criticized Clinton's record as governor of Arkansas. "We don't want to be the lowest of the low. We don't want to be a nation in decline. We are a rising nation."

Clinton praised Perot for stressing the importance of the deficit, and paid tribute to Bush for his service to the nation. "I wish him well," he said of the president, "I just believe its time for a change."

Bush said the election came down to "who has the judgement and the experience, and yes, the character" to serve in the Oval Office.

those who were helping out sick of the whole thing.

"A lot of people start and try to do all they can for it, but they get burned out," Tom Matthew, the accountant for the co-op, said.

Many speculated on what changes could be made to stabilize it. One notion was instituting a payroll for consistent members. Veterans of the bike co-op like Germino, Dorie Goldman, and Dylan Kirshner have given their supreme effort to tighten the organization and make it more efficient, available, and accommodating.

This led to the creation of the "steering committee", which has made the co-op more available to the students.

"Most of the participants were volunteer before and it's difficult to get people to work more," said Germino. He said with the steering committee the co-op is hoping to get more people so it'll be more like an actual shop. "I was the only one here last spring," he said.

The bicycle co-op is located across the hall from the post office in the Student Union.

Also present at the talks, Jo-Anne Vanin, the Dean of Students, said she too was optimistic after the meeting.

"I think it's good we're talking. There's a commitment on all sides — I feel good about that," said Vanin.

Fabiola Narcisse, president of the Black Student Union who attended the meeting was unavailable for comment.

Actions to be undertaken in the coming weeks as part of the Chancellor's plan include: restoration of training in human relations, social crisis and crisis intervention for all campus personnel. The staff Training and Development Program, eliminated in past budget cuts will also be restored.

Internal security phones will be installed for residence hall safety, a provision of $100,000 to fund a series of proposals for multicultural events, the purchase of an additional vehicle for the escort service and the expansion of new student programs with greater emphasis on issues of social justice.

Jen Wood, president of the Student Government Association, said she feels the actions are a good step in the right direction, but that more needs to be done to address all minority concerns.

Walsh said that the students who attended the meeting will report back to the student population on the meeting and that the two-week deadline they had set would extend through the second meeting which is scheduled for next Saturday.

The CIA received hundreds if not thousands of such reports, many of which its agents in Miami deemed credible, said Frank.

this enormous resource. The network is already in place, and the state should utilize and publicize it."

Common complaints of businesses included pervasive inefficiency of information within various state organizations that caused expensive wasting of time.

John Gallup, the Senior Vice-President for the Greater Springfield Chamber of Commerce, said his forum held it just about unanimous that the state system was over-regulatory. He said, "There was a lack of a sensitive attitude . . . and a lack of response to business needs."

One request that repeatedly arose is a "one-stop shopping" information center where businesses can find out exactly who they need to speak to in the state bureaucracy.

Lt. Gov. Cellucci said the administration supports the concept. "A business can waste months trying to find which person to talk to," he said. He said they hope to create one overlapping agency to coordinate information.

Dr. Lynn Griesemer, associate director of the Donahue Institute, said part of the value of these conferences is hope.

EWC's twenty year commitment to women and multiculturalism

I am writing in response to a recent Collegian "survey" regarding the accessibility of Everywoman's Center Services [Oct. 8]. EWC is a multi-service women's center with a 20-year commitment to growth as a multicultural organization and provision of culturally appropriate services. The mission of EWC is to provide leadership in promoting educational access and equity for women in higher education. EWC defines multiculturalism in the broadest sense and emphasizes services for women who experience discrimination by virtue of gender, race, ethnicity, class, sexual orientation, religion, ability and/or age.

EWC began in 1972 with a desk, a phone and one volunteer. Over the years, EWC continued to expand services for women of color, low-income women, re-entry women, working women, etc., in its struggle to provide campus and community women with the fullest possible access to the University's resources. EWC outreach efforts target agencies that serve women of color and low-income women. Brochures, press releases and many educational materials are available in English and Spanish. In-service trainings focus on all issues of oppression.

In recent years, budget cuts have eliminated six EWC programs: Bridge (formerly Third World Women's), Counseling, Legal Advocacy, Public Relations/Outreach, WAGES and Working Women's Program. Four were coordinated by women of color at the time of elimination. Elimination of these programs not only undermined critical services for women of color, low-income women, re-entry women and working women, but also undermined ongoing efforts to diversify staff. Of the remaining four programs (Counselor/Advocate, Educator/Advocate, Resource/Referral and Graduate Women's Program), two were coordinated by women of color during FY92.

The last programs to be eliminated were Public Relations/Outreach and Counseling Services. At this time EWC identified restoration of counseling as the first priority. EWC receives calls from women in crisis and seeking counseling services every day. The Counseling Program provides services exclusively to students and low-income women. Community women with insurance or the resources to pay for counseling services are given referrals. Since EWC is the only agency in Hampshire County that offers free counseling services, these are women who would otherwise not have access to counseling. Approximately 10 percent of participants are women of color. A search has been completed for a Coordinator of Counseling Services and the position offered to a woman of color contingent upon funding.

EWC rape crisis services (Counselor/Advocate and Educator/Advocate programs) serve the second highest number of participants of any rape crisis center in Massachusetts. Approximately 20 percent of participants are women of color. EWC continues to make substantial progress in diversifying its paid student staff as well. During FY93, four of five graduate students (80 percent) and nine of fourteen undergraduate students (64 percent) are women of color.

To achieve a truly multicultural community we must build coalitions and work together. There will always be room for improvement and more work to do, but to target an organization that has dedicated 20 years to advocating for and serving all women, and an organization that has itself been targeted for budget cuts, can serve no constructive purpose. We welcome constructive criticism, and invite the community to work with us in coalition, through joint programming or co-sponsorship of activities, or by joining our staff as an intern or volunteer.

Remembering old haunts

Having grown up in the city means much to me now. As a youngster I took for granted the now unusual things I lived through in my neighborhood. Halloween, for some time, was the highlight of the year. Sometimes, not always, Halloween was just as important as Christmas.

There were dozens of kids my age that I grew up with. We had our own little world, mainly consisting of club houses, baseball cards and after school Nerf football. And once a year all of us were professional trick or treaters, usually counting down the days in anticipation.

David
RIVERA

I never made much of costumes; unfortunately my mother did. Not that she was compelled to please me, more because she would find herself competing against the other neighborhood mothers for the best costume.

As neighborhoods go, mine was a smorgasbord of people and architectural eras. The area was once an old ethnic neighborhood with traditional triple-deckers, small houses and quaint brownstones. The folks who lived there were as different as that architecture. Old timers and their families lived right along with hippies, and soon to be yuppies.

Halloween, I thought, was special for its rewards: candy, jokes, costumes and horror stories. But eventually I saw that people, not candy, were the reasons for the long awaited day.

I remember being so excited I would map out my route of attack. First Regina's house, then Sam the Bookie, Mrs. B's, the Crazy Professor's, and then we would run home to count and eat, and eat and eat. The map altered as the night progressed but everyone felt the wrath of my friends and I.

Our moms corralled us to and fro, but never, never were they to come directly to the house with us. That was strictly forbidden and against Article 1, Section 1 of the Code of Trick of Treating. Dads, of course, were stuck with door duty. My dad would complain, but every year he would find some gory mask to scare kids. He never fooled me, he loved that night as much as we did.

Regina, the old Italian lady who lived one house over, gave us homemade cookies instead of candy. Those cookies — bliss, sheer bliss. "Adorable, adorable!" was her response to every kid that came to her door. "Now everyone take a handful," she would say, holding a tray of "special Halloween wine cookies." These were our favorite. Not because they were sugar and cinnamon coated, but because we believed if we ate enough of these "wine cookies," we were sure to get drunk.

From house to house we marauded. Some homes were better than others, but no one was as generous as Old David. We thought he was at least as old as his scary-looking, ancient house. Opening his door he would demand the trick instead of the treat. "Never settle for the trick," was our gang motto. After some bartering he would eventually hold out a bag of candy. That's when the frenzy began.

Because he was somewhat blind, we would of course grab until his bag was empty. I'm sure he didn't mind; he lived all alone and now, years later, I can see that he lived for that evening. His door would open more that one night than it did all year long. For one night of the year he wasn't alone.

As true darkness took the night, our flashlights would light our way. All around we could see other groups of kids, with their moms following close behind, boasting at the amount of candy they had gotten. And when it was over, we would all head home to sort through the "good stuff" and the stuff you gave to your younger bothers or sisters.

After eating several pounds of everything we would fall asleep to Halloween stories only to wake up in the morning and start waiting again for next year.

The neighborhood has changed. My family moved out years ago. The gang parted ways, some are married with kids. Old David died a few years ago; someone bought his house and tore it down. Regina took ill and had to move out of state — she took her wine cookie recipe with her. Most of the and houses have fallen to the condo craze of the '80s, so it doesn't quite look like the old neighborhood. But every year on that October day, during dusk, the old neighborhood returns. It returns for other kids, other moms, other door duty dads and yes — it returns for some of us sentimental fools.

Candleight vigil against racism

Racism is a social disease that divides and hurts people. It is created by an unhealthy community environment where people become frustrated, angry and confused. I know there is no quick solution for this disease, but one definite response is to show it no tolerance, to address it whereever it may appear, and to show its victims support and not allow it to destroy your hope for a more civilized world.

As a community, we must come together to respond to this social disease called racism, as long as there are individuals willing to learn how racism affects our lives and how to get involved in protesting racial acts. I am sure we are headed on a path towards a better society. I would like to invite you to participate in a Candelight Vigil to condemn racism. The vigil is to make clear that racism and unsocial behavior will be confronted wherever it may appear in this community. For more information please contact the Office of Third World Affairs at 545-2517. Your help in organizing this event is more than welcomed.

Speyer says thanks

This letter is to thank the staff of the Collegian and the members of the academic community who continue to support me during the most painful and stressful time my family has experienced. I have worked for the UMass Library for the past 18 years with a work schedule of Monday to Friday, 8 a.m.-4:30 p.m. I regret the management did not accommodate my need as a single parent and provider to continue that schedule and, instead, disciplined me for my choice to parent and my inability to accept the change to Sun. to Thurs., 2 p.m.-10 p.m.

I continue to be suspended without pay for choosing to stand by my family. As a result I have been warned that I am subject to further disciplinary action, up to and including termination. Despite the risk of losing the means to provide for my family, I do not regret my decision. I feel supported in my belief that we have the potential to work together to guarantee that all treated with equal respect, civility and compassion, and that everyone's contributions will be acknowledged and valued.

HASA raises questions, demands answers

The Haitian American Student Alliance (HASA) is concerned about the recent racial incidents on this campus. In particular, we demand an explanation from the police and the administration regarding the treatment of our member Mr. Arlens Barosy. We also want to inform the students on this campus about the events that both the University and the Collegian are not reporting.

On Thursday, Oct. 8, approximately 50 skinheads were on this campus armed with baseball bats, sticks and knives. A White female was attacked, beaten and called a "nigger lover" by the skinheads because of her participation in the peaceful vigil organized by the Black students on campus. On Oct. 9, more racial slurs were written on the door of a Black student's room on the 20th floor in Washington as well as on the door a Black student's room in Baker. On Oct. 11, racial slurs were written once again on Arlens' floor.

Who are behind these incidents? Supposedly the University is expelling the residents on the 8th floor where Arlens' attacker was caught hiding. What about the residents on the 18th floor who wrote the racial slurs and smeared feces on Arlens' door? Will the administration take any action against them? Also on Sunday, Oct. 11, a resident on Arlens' floor caught four students writing racial slurs on the floor walls. Are the police and the University doing anything about that?

HASA is calling on the administration to stop giving lip service to the student body and take proper and necessary actions against racial violence occurring on campus. We are requesting that the University enforces its policies and serves justice evenhandedly. By not taking the required actions, the administration is turning this campus into a place where fear and division run rampant, making it impossible for all students to do what they came here for, which is to get an education. Additionally, the administration is putting people's life in danger and giving a bad name to this university. If the administration fails to take proper actions against the perpetrators of these violent and racist crimes, HASA will feel compelled to create their own solutions.

We the members of HASA applaud all those who despise bigotry and hatred. The time to sing, "We shall overcome someday," has passed; it's "Action now or there will be no peace."

Boyfriend acts out dream of murdering girlfriend

By TONY ROGERS
Associated Press

SALEM, Mass. — A year before a 14-year-old Beverly girl was stabbed to death and her body dumped in a pond, her boyfriend said he had dreamed of killing the girl, a classmate of the couple testified Monday.

The testimony came in the second week of the trial of Jamie Fuller, 17, of Beverly, who faces one count of first degree murder in the Aug. 23, 1991 death of Amy Carnevale.

Michael Sciucco, 17, of Danvers, testified that he, Fuller and Sarnevale were in Fuller's room one day in the summer of 1990 when Fuller told him of a dream he had.

Fuller dreamed "that he took Amy in the woods, gave her a rose and then killed her," Sciucco told a Salem Superior Court jury.

Prosecutors say Fuller stabbed Carnevale in the woods near Beverly's Memorial Middle School, then dumped her body in a pond near an abandoned machinery plant in the town north of Boston.

Police, acting on information from a friend of Fuller's , found Carnevale's body wrapped in plastic and weighted with cinder blocks.

On the day of the killing, Fuller and Carnevale walked into the woods in full view of several of their friends, prosecutors said. The friends reported hearing two screams, then seeing Fuller emerge from the woods covered in blood and holding a broken knife.

Defense attorney Hugh Samson, who began presenting his case to jurors Monday, contends that Fuller was a tormented teen who was driven to kill by steroid and alcohol abuse.

Sciucco, co-captain of the football team at Beverly High, said his friend had been a shy, skinny boy in the seventh grade when he began dating Carnevale.

But by the eigth grade Fuller was lifting weights almost daily and had gained 30 pounds of muscle, Sciucco testified.

"He got bigger and stronger," Sciucco said. "He looked and acted like a tough guy."

But there were other, more disturbing changes. Fuller grew more aggressive and his relationship with Carnevale deteriorated, Sciucco said. Once, Sciucco said he spotted a book on anabolic steroids in Fuller's room and on another occasion, a hypodermic needle.

meal that is simple to make, according to Wells. Wells also mentioned that frozen meals are not as nutritious as meals prepared from scratch.

"We are so obsessed with meals that take 30 minutes to prepare that we don't realize the best foods takes very little preparation time," Wells said. "You could eat very well with just a cutting board, a refrigerator, and a hot pot."

Wells finds religion to play a big role in the way Americans look at food. Religion tells us that pleasure is bad, according to Wells. Even our language expresses this idea, Wells mentioned. We call delicious food "sinfully good" and chocolate cake is called "devil's food cake'.

In the past American food has been bland, according to Well. She points to the turn of the century when German and Italian heritage was smothered for political reasons, according Wells.

"We either like bland or peppery food. We are just afraid of food," Wells said.

But Wells believe in the future, there will be a change of tastes.

"We still have a huge wave of immigrants opening restaurants. We will have more exciting food."

Twins allegedly run over, stab supermarket worker

MILFORD, Mass. (AP) — Teen-age twins from Milford and a Franklin man were arraigned Monday on charges that they ran over a supermarket worker and then stabbed him repeatedly.

Milford District Judge Edward Viola ordered Shawn Medina, 17, and Michael S. Dignard Jr., 18, each jailed on $25,00 cash bond in connection with last week's attack on Steven Rossacci outside Super Stop and Shop.

Viola set bond at $10,000 for Shawn Medina's twin brother, Michael.

Police say the men tried to rob the 19-year-old Milford man as he left work about 11 p.m. Wednesday. Witnesses said that Rossacci fled toward the store, but he was struck from behind by a car.

The driver then backed up and struck Rossacci again. His body caught on the undercarriage, Rossacci was dragged as the car backed up and lunged forward repeatedly, said police Detective Joseph Gresian.

Then Shawn Medina allegedly jumped out of the car and stabbed Rossacci several times with a screwdriver, he said. Police said Dignard was driving.

Rossacci suffered injuries ranging from a punctured lung and stab wounds to broken collar bones and other internal injuries, police said. However, a spokeswoman at University of Massachusetts Medical Center in Worcester said information about Rossacci's condition was unavailable.

The Medina twins surrendered to police Friday, while Dignard was arrested on Saturday, Gresian said.

All three were charged with assault with intent to murder, while Shawn Medina faces the additional charge of assault and battery with a dangerous weapon.

Dignard also faces charges on assault and battery with a dangerous weapon (motor vehicle), operating without a license, operating an uninsured and unregistered car, failure to yield to a pedestrian and driving to endanger, among others.

Student Telephone Directory

Distribution of the 1992-93 Student Telephone Directory will begin later this week and take about five work days to complete (so please be patient).

Residence hall students will receive one copy per room with delivery being made through cooperation of the Area Operations Offices. Commuters will receive copies via bulk drop at the Campus Center Concourse following deliveries to residence halls (probably early next week); Staff and Faculty via campus mail.

15,000 copies are printed. It is unlikely that any excess copies will be available following the initial distribution.

The primary purpose of the directory is to provide a listing of residence hall room telephones (prefix 546) whose numbers are not otherwise available through Directory Assistance/ Information.

The directory is printed by an outside contractor at no cost to students or the University.

Corrections of addresses and telephone numbers should be made at the Registrar's Office.

You may note some "unusual" address abbreviations. These are due to a computer problem at the vendor's computer conversion company. For the full name of residence halls see page 7; for Amherst street addresses, page 10. Hopefully, this matter will be rectified by the Spring Supplement (5,000 copies).

Candyman won't rot your teeth, but be sure to brush afterwards

COURTESY TRI-STAR PICTURES.

Tony Todd and Virginia Madsen of Candyman.

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Despite the fact that Candyman descends into ooga-booga horror nonsense in the third act, this contemporary urban shocker is actually a notch above the usual fare. But that isn't really saying much, now is it? Candyman isn't exactly a fantastic movie (not even a particularly good one), but for most of it, the film taps into a common fear of the irrational, gooses the audience a few times and in a controversial sidebar, injects an undercurrent racism.

You will find no Stephen King knock-offs or buxom coeds getting sliced as they lose their virginity here, as director Bernard Rose concocts a promising (if eventually underwhelming) shocker from a Clive Barker short story.

Virginia Madsen (Highlander 2) plays Helen Lyle, a grad student at the University of Illinois who is writing her thesis on urban folklore. Madsen is piqued by one particular legend, the one about the hook-handed Candyman (Tony Todd), who can be summoned by chanting Candyman five times in the mirror.

Naturally skeptic and cynical, Madsen starts off as a refreshingly fearless heroine, as she probes the roots of the Candyman legend in Cabrini Green, a local housing project. A series (it's always a series) of gruesome murders has solidified Candyman lore into the already gang-ridden project.

To get the plot moving, Madsen utters Candyman five times in the mirror and nothing happens...right away. In some innovative twists, the hook-handed wonder reaps his horror on Madsen (and others as well).

Up until this point, Candyman generates some well-earned suspense, but I lost it as the film descended into some goofy horror melodrama, with Candyman wanting Madsen (get this) to be his lover beyond the grave. Excuse me? Did I miss something?

The gaping problem with Candyman is the title character. Who exactly is this robed guy?. The film gives some third-rate gothic tale (something about a doomed love affair) to explain why he has a hook hand.

It also makes a point about the fact he was killed by getting stung by a hive of bees. The latter point is for no other reason it seems than to have Todd have live bees crawl out of his mouth. Nice, squirmy trick guys, but w-h-y?

We really never get to see Candyman enough for him to work as a conventional horror villain. Maybe that's for the best, keeping the psycho in the shadows adds to his allure, but there's no motivation for the hyperactive, pseudo-operatic (that's a new one) ending.

By switching the location of Barker's short story "The Forbidden" from a Liverpool project to the real-life Cabrini Green and by making Candyman black, director Rose adds a layer of racism that's virtually virgin to this genre. However, by making Madsen look like a great white savior, Rose undercuts his whole subtext.

The entire cast of Candyman admirably tries to avoid horror film cliches, but erratic performances persist. Madsen acts her heart out here and she works best in the first hour as her gradual cynicism over the legend and the irrationality of it all wears down into fear. Unfortunately, her performance wears down as well, dissolving into a near farce as she tries to save a crying baby from a trash heap (don't ask).

Tony Todd (Worf's brother on Star Trek: The Next Generation) isn't given much to do as Candyman, except walk around with a hook hand and speak in an overdubbed voice that sounds like he's bellowing into the intercom mike at Stop and Shop. But he was brave enough to have bees in his mouth, so let's give credit where it's due.

Vanessa Williams (not the singer but the actress from Melrose Place) gets to show some un-Aaron Spelling range as a resident of Cabrini Green. And Kasi Lemmons (Jodie Foster's FBI cadet sidekick in Silence of the Lambs) plays Madsen's partner and since she's the lead's best friend we all know what happens to her...

Bernard Rose, who directed 1988's underrated mind game Paperhouse, tries vainly to make a film that will ressurect the horror genre, yet Candyman isn't it. This film won't rot your teeth but four out of five movie critics recommend you rent Paperhouse instead.

Author tells of Columbus with innocent eyes

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

In order to wind down its reflection of the quincentennial of Columbus' arrival in the new world, Hampshire College hosted distinguished author Michael Dorris to speak last Sunday evening.

The author of The Crown of Columbus, which he co-wrote with his wife, Dorris addressed the quincentennial as a matter of the next five hundred years rather than of the past. With extensive experience and study in the field of anthropology, he asserted that we must look to the through of the past without repeating our mistakes in the future.

One way in which Dorris gives voice to the past is with his literature. The Crown of Columbus, for example, tells the story of Vivian Twostar, an associate professor at Dartmouth College who tracks down one of the diaries of Columbus. In learning about his exploits and redefining her beliefs about Columbus, this woman of Native American descent learns a lot about herself.

Dorris read from his latest work on Sunday, a childrens book titled Morning Girl. This is the story of a twelve-year-old girl named Morning Girl, living in the Bahamas, who is the first human to encounter Columbus upon his arrival in the Western Hemisphere.

The story was inspired by Dorris' study of the mirror trade propagated by Columbus in his early years. Morning Girl exhibits normal curiosity concerning her physical appearance and in essence who she is. At one point she asks her brother, "But what is me?" to which he merely responds "You are you."

Morning Girl eventually learns about her appearance by studying the features of her family and determining which of those she shares with various relatives. This seemingly simple concept teaches us not only to remember where we come from, but to keep our appearance in perspective. It also makes the idea of a mirror seem debilitating in our struggle to figure out who we are.

Morning Girl is modeled after a true girl cited in Columbus' diary to be one of the first people he met, described to be "one quite young girl." Dorris' fictitious character illustrates the vast difference between the technology of Columbus' world and the simple ideals of the people native to the land.

She also makes the reader question the idea of barbarism, for when we look through her eyes at Columbus for the first time, we see a man not found in any history book.

The reader is drawn into the peaceful world of sparkling water and cool ocean breezes when Morning Girl encounters the "fat people in the canoe." Upon seeing these strangers Morning Girl greets them in her friendliest way, but gets no response. She recognizes their surprise at seeing her, and continues to welcome the despite the fact that they are "brainless as gulls."

Morning Girl's innocent warmth and excitement to engage in conversation and trade with the strangers paints a picture of a friendly society anxious to "embrace the possibility of difference" presented by Columbus and his men. Little did she or her people know of the conqueror's true intentions that eventually crushed their entire civilization.

Although the "boys in the boat" may have won whatever claim to the Western Hemisphere, Dorris claims the loss of the treasures of the "beautiful, gentle and impossible to enslave" people who lived here before us turns Columbus' victory into a bitter one indeed.

Through this story Dorris emphasizes the evolution of multiculturalism. From his ancestors who lived in segregated, ethnocentric tribes to our jumbled society today, Dorris asserts that "Our diversity as a species has always been our salvation."

He concluded his lecture by asking us to look at the future as an opportunity to use our knowledge of the past not to mend Columbus' errors but to develop our respect for one another and for our differences.

"As we begin the next five hundred years," he began, "let us all do a better job."

10,000 Maniacs finds their own lyrical Eden

By SHARON MURPHY
Collegian Correspondent

Our Time In Eden
10,000 Maniacs
Elektra Records

It has been over three years since we have heard anything new from 10,000 Maniacs, with the exception of a 1990 compilation album, Hope Chest. Now the group has changed their lyrics on their new album Our Time In Eden with that hint of redemption hidden through it all.

Led by lyricist-singer Natalie Mercahand with guitarist Rob Buck, keyboardist Dennis Drew, bassist Steve Gustafson and drummer Jerome Augustyniak, the Maniacs bring out a fresh and more uplifting sound than in the past.

The album starts off with the chilling ballad "Noah's Dove." The piano arrangement grabs the listener from its intro with a loud and pronounced sound that builds throughout the song and with Merchant's beautiful voice.

An upbeat turn is taken on "These Are Days," which is probably one of the most optimistic songs in the groups's archive. The song makes a point of saying, "enjoy everything around you."

The dark ballads are still on the album, with a darker tone and more aggressive vocals. On "Tolerance" and "I'm Not the Man," Merchant's vocals blend with the bellowing of the music. Both quickly grab the listener with an eerie power to believe everything that is being said.

A new edition to the group's sound is the use of J.B. Horns on "Few and Far Between" and "Candy Everybody Wants." The tracks show a playfullness, unlike other songs they have done in the past, with a soulful twist.

The track "Eden" makes one realize that time is always against us no matter what we do to try to stop it. The lyrics paint a poetic tapestry for the listener to interpret for themselves. Along with "Eden," two other tracks that summarize what the album's title means are "Jezebel" and "If You Intend."

"Jezebel" is a song that is strong and rich in its musical and lyrical content. Starting off as a slow, but beautifully orchestrated ballad, the song takes a turn to show the power of the character's anger. The song follows a woman's frustration against a marriage she regrets getting involved with and the fear of a divorce.

More powerful, yet simple in its own way is the song "If You Intend." It displays the sight of seeing someone's pride hide the fact that they are dying from AIDS. Merchant's voice is painfully pleading for the person to reach out to those around you before it is too late.

Our Time In Eden flows with the narrative observances that revolve around one crucial aspect of life — time. Without it we will not know where we are going. With it we will be misled into mysterious turns that make up our life.

10,000 Maniacs convey this message with the right amount of intensity when it needs to be done. They let us create our own Eden in our hearts where we can control all the time we want — while we have it.

The Machine flops as a Floyd tribute band

The Machine
Pearl Street
October 15, 1992

My expectations were high as I entered the smoky lower level of the Pearl Street night club this last Thursday night. Billed, of course, as "The Ultimate Pink Floyd Tribute Band", The Machine had drawn a large crowd of excited Floyd fans, many of whom I suspect had seen the band before.

I myself am a giant Floyd fan. Wish You Were Here was, in my opinion, their last great album, the end of an amazing saga that began with the wild Syd Barrett years, took us through David Gilmour's birth as a guitarist of tremendous influence and finally Roger Waters' dark exploration of the state of humankind.

Both "Animals" and "The Wall" have their strengths, but compared to earlier Floyd come across like basically dull and occasionally pretentious musical experiments.

So what about The Machine? Ugh. First off, they started an hour and a half late, which is something I barely take in an original band, let alone a "tribute band". I watched the band members (as I correctly guessed them to be by their cheesy garb) chat and drink as the crowd poured thousands of dollars into Pearl Street cash registers.

When they finally came onstage and plugged into the stacks of beeping equipment, I was ready for a serious tribute to one of the great bands of history, complete with rare songs and perfect renditons. What I got was a wet noodle beating that began with the tepid "Learning to Fly" from Floyd's most recent album (1988? — whatever it was called), uninspired covers of good songs from "The Wall" and the oh-so-daring "Money," a classic rock radio staple guaranteed not to offend anyone.

Most of the songs in their first set were from "The Wall," and nothing they played had even the slightest hint of obscurity. If these guys are fanatic Floyd-Heads, why couldn't they pull out some gem that only those who know Pink Floyd's music from the albums and not from WAQY rock-blocks would recognize and love?

My guess is that The Machine learned their Floyd tunes from the diligent taping of all the Pink Floyd rock-blocks they could find. I was told by an unconfirmed source that night that The Machine makes a million dollars a year doing this schlock.

If you love Floyd skip this yawn-fest next time it comes around and save your money for a real band.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Be very polite to your neighbors and show sympathy for those who work hard. Too much self-analysis could lead to inaction. Trust your instincts.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Be careful if tempted to offer advice to your adult offspring. This loved one wants sympathy, not suggestions. Focus on community service. It is your destiny to help others learn to help themselves.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You deserve better than what you have been getting. Refuse to give up! There is plenty of time to make a new start. If necessary, seek professional assistance.

CANCER (June 21 - July 22): Does it ever bother you that they named a disease after your sign? Today will be a day much like every other day, so take care to notice the similarities.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Your sense of humor helps you win friends and influence potential enemies. You will get out of life whatever you put into it. A busy social calendar keeps you on the go!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): You may be too easily influenced by other people now. An indirect business approach will produce extraordinary results. Your finances receive a welcome boost.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Your desire for a close relationship grows stronger every day. Postpone a luxury purchase until you have built up a larger cash reserve. You will never regret planning for a rainy day.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Now is the time to do those things that will put you in charge of a situation or event. Overoptimism or fuzzy thinking could lead you astray. Avoid jumping into the unknown.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Although climbing the stairway to success is difficult at times, you can reach the top. Keep your tacts straight and avoid going to extremes. Make plans for the Christmas holidays.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Try to stay on course with a new enterprise. Do not get involved in legal high jinks or offbeat business proposals. If worried about a technical matter, seek professional help.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A delay or mixup looms. To rush forward or retreat is hazardous, seek the middle ground. The difficult issues of the day should be discussed calmly.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Have nothing to do with people you know are snobbish. You are lucky to be free of their influence. The best way to strike it rich is through wise investments.

Whose world . . . Whose America . . . ?

"When we read the history books given to children in the United States, it all starts with heroic adventure...there is no bloodshed...and Columbus Day is a celebration." -Howard Zinn, A Peoples History of the United States

The year 1992 has been declared as the "Year Against Genocide" by the Native American Nations throughout the Americas. October 12, 1992 was marked by a spate of protests world over, condemning the celebration of Columbus' "discovery" of the "new world."

Five hundred years ago, the "hero" Columbus sailed forth seeking a passage to India, in search of gold and spices. He accidently landed in the Carribean and was to wrote in his log, "They brought us parrots, balls of cotton and spears and many other things...they willingly traded everything they owned...They were well-built, with good bodies and handsome features...with 50 men we could subjugate them all and make them do whatever we want."

Thus began the era of genocide, violence, exploitation, and bloodshed against the peoples of Africa, Asia, and the Americas; an odyssey of unparalled exploitation that continues even today.

The story of Columbus being told features the arrival of European "civilization" in a land "uninhabited." The obliteration of 98% of the indigenous populations of this hemisphere by warfare, starvation, and imported disease is pictured as an unfortunate side effect.

The holdiay is a symbol of the celebration of a trail of murder, theft, and broken treaties that followed Columbus'discovery. It is akin to the glorification of the Jewish holocaust, or the bombing of Hiroshima or Cambodia. It is an assertion on the part of the dominant culture that benefitting through exploitation and killing is acceptable.

The Columbus quincentennial raises a matrix of complex issues relating to racism, intervention, the environment, sovereignity for people of color, land rights, and cultural rights. It draws focus to the fact that the violence people of color face world over is part of that continuum of colonial violence which American and European governments propose to celebrate in the form of Columbus' voyage from Europe to America.

Shyamala
IVATURY

As the process of colonization has unfolded, the legacy of exploitation has continued. To give a few concrete examples-

1) Today in Columbia and other Latin American countries, cyanide-based chemical processes are causing severe pollution. It's continued use is justified because helps extract precious metals from old mines. Metals that are then sold by U.S. companies for a profit.

2) In the western part of the United States, uranium mining on reservations has caused increased levels of radioactivity. The hazzards of this can be seen in the fact that the Navaho population experiences birth defects which are 8 times above the national average. Uranium mining is important for President Bush's energy policy.

3) In Central America the U.S. agro-export policy or the "hamburger connection" destroys much of the land by clearing it for cattle to graze. The cheap beef enhances fast-food restaurants, while the clearing of the land causes severe erosion of top soil in these countries.

4) In Kuwait after the Gulf War, there were 732 oil wells on fire, lifting almost 100,000 tons of smoke and soot into the atmosphere daily. The long-term effects of this is unknown.

5) In 1984, in Bhopal, India, a pesticide leak at a U.S. owned Union Carbide Plant killed 2,000 people initially.

6) In 1987, the Haitian governement issued an import permit for fertilizer to the cargo ship "Khian Sea." However, the ship's cargo consisted of 13,476 tons of toxi municipal fertilizer ash from Philadelphia.

A closer look at racism and the enviornment within the United States reveals the following:

1) 3 of the 5 largest commerical hazardous waste land fills are in Black or Hispanic communities. These account for 40% of the nation's estimated land fill space.

2) 3 out of 5 African-American and Latin Americans live in communities with uncontrolled toxic waste sites.

3) About one-halfo of the Native Americans live on lands with uncontrolled toxic waste sites.

As was the case 500 years ago, when Columbus set sail, the exploitation of people from Asian, Africa, and the Americas benefits the "white power structure," U.S. and European multinationals, and the majority white citizens of their nations.

It is the case that the people of color world over are being exploitated by the minority white population of this planet. Most of the economies of developing nations are ravaged by imperialism and neo-colonialism. When people of color within the U.S. continue to face racism and discrimination, it is no small wonder that this philosophy is reflected at the UMass campus.

Puerto Rican culture and politics examined

Yesterday, I was listening to several Ruben Blades' songs such as "Tiburon" and "Patrica," when a woman from Guinea Equatorial asked me if I were Latin American. I instinctively replied "Yes, I'm Puerto Rican." She laughed and asked, "but isn't Puerto Rico a territorial possession or a colony of the United States?" She laughed even harder and asked me, "so why is it that the majority of Portoricans would prefer to become either the fifty-first child of the union, or remain a colonial possession of the Anglo-American Empire?" I replied, "It's an economic thing." She laughed and responded, "Oh, so it's true that Portoricans love the welfare system."

Charles R.
VENATOR-SANTIAGO

The majority of citizens of Anglo-America neither care nor have a clue about the geographical extension of their empire. Most can't even name all of the fifty states of their union, nuch less the colonial possessions of their nation. Boriken, or in Spanish terms Puerto Rico, is one of over 2,200 islands currently appropriated by Anglo-America. Yes, Iraq took over one country, while the U.S. has formally invaded and colonized over 2,200 island territories.

Nonetheless, the question of Boriken should be examined in greater detail by the majority of Portoricans. If allowed Portoricans, a term developed by and for Anglo-American purposes, would choose to become the fifty-first child of the union, or remain a colonial possession of this northern giant, rather than join the rest of the Latin American nations (with the exception of Mexico) as a free and independent country.

Currently, portoricans (U.S. Citizens by Might of Jones Act of 1917) are eligible to be drafted, receive welfare benefits, exempted from paying federal taxes, while not being allowed to have proportional representation in the U.S. Congress, along with a myriad of other procedural legalitites which maintain Puerto Rico as a ghettoe state of social-economic development.

As of today, over fity percent of the island's population would be eligible to receive poverty level benefits by U.S. standards. As a state, besides being elibgle to have more congressional representation than 30 states of the union, over seventy-five percent of the population would make more money receiving welfare benefits rather than working, under current U.S. standards.

However, what must be clear, is that no matter how confused and ignorant the majority of Portoricans are of the social-political-economic realities, their cultural heritage stands in their way, possing a strong element of resistance.

Culture, although continously being redefined, is still the most outstanding means of rebellion that challenges Anglo-American hegemony over our community. Culture, or a shared set of historical experiences, has no geographical boundaries. No Portorican can deny their African, Taino, and or Spanish heritage. No Portorican can hide his or her language, food, music . . . beauty, no matter how "Euforicly" hard they try.

In the words of an honrable pirate, "in the land of faithful blind servants, the on eyed will rule."

Whose campus . . . ?

Exploitation has become an ingrained doctrine that is systematically structured in Western cultures. The system is structured so that white people are often unwilling to admit they are privileged, even though they may recognize that people of color are disadvantaged. White people do not recognize the corollary relationship, by being advantaged, and the connection to those who are disadvantaged.

Sandra
ROSE

The University of Massachusetts is in a position where it recognizes that people of color are disadvantaged, but continues to perpetuate the oppressive condition, through it's resistance to truly create a multi-cultural environment. How can UMass claim that it is a diverse campus, when the most disadvantaged in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts are denied access to education, when minority students, staff, and faculty only make up 10% of the campus population, when the hostile racial climate endanger the lives of the students of color on the campus?

In an era where public school systems are failing, the students suffer the most. Minority communities have been hit the hardest by the failed educational system. Minority students often fall through the "cracks" and then are unfairly blamed for a being a victim of a societal problem. It's not that they can't do the work, it's because the school systems have failed them. For many minority students living in urban cities, they cannot see the connection between success and education, because higher education is often not a possibility. Students of color are becoming more separated with education.

In light of this fact, UMass cuts one of the most vital programs that provide an opportunity for disadvantaged minority students to make college a reality. UMass actively recruits athletes each year, but where is their commitment to bringing inner-city students to this campus?

Low-income women of color with families have little access to education and college is almost impossible without assistance in childcare, housing, tuition, and health-care. These women cannot get out of their present conditions without having an alternative to improve their lives.

Currently, there are no programs specifically designed to bring more low-income women of color to this campus, and there are only a few services to aide the women who are already here.

UMass is a white cultural center that breeds privileged white people. The core-curriculum is Eurocentric and elitist. Students of color often feel isolated and frustrated not only because of the low representation of minority students, but because of what is being taught. Students of color are subjected to distorted Euro-American perspectives that does not recognize that it was the sacrifice, labor, and resources of people of color that built this country. White students are in such a state of denial that they cannot even recognize the extent of "white" exploitation of people of color.

Insensitive treatment goes beyond student relations. Top level administrators, faculty, staff, and police contribute to the hostile racial climate on campus. It is not the students of color who are beating up residents. It is not students of color who are defecating on cultural centers. It is not students of color who are teaching racism and violence in the classrooms.

Students of color are justified for reacting to the hostile racial climate that is set up for them. Why should we remain passive, while our adversaries are taught to be violent, hateful, and racist? We must bring our voices together in protest.

The token 10 percent minority representation on this campus is being exploited. We are subjected to discrimination, violence, and insensitivity on a daily basis, while administrators use us to make UMass' application booklets and recruitment pamphlets more attractive by creating a multi-cultural facade.

The administration would like to take the credit for the few improvements made towards a multi-cultural university, but the truth is that the University has failed its mission. Most of the changes that have occurred to improve the situation for students of color have been through student activism. The resistance and backlash that students of color have met in the past is a testament to the ignorance of white privileged people who do not understand the reasons why students of color who feel unsafe, discriminated against, and misrepresented in the dominant culture.

White students will always be in the company of people in of their race. White students will learn their history and the contributions that their ancestors' made in this society. White students will never be attacked by a mob of Black students over a dispute about a baseball game. White students will never have to be a "credit to their race." White students will never have to fight for their basic rights because UMass is a large white cultural center that caters to its white populous.

"This is not such a free country; one's life is not what one makes it: many doors open for certain people through no virtues of their own." — Peggy McIntosh

There, I might have been sitting," said Johnson.

Johnson decided to come here to UMass when Koch saw him playing in a tournament in Dallas, and it was then a matter of time before he came to Amherst.

"Coach Koch saw me playing in the Dallas Cup this year, and I was looking to stay close to home at that point. I came here, and liked the campus, the program, and the players," said Johnson.

Koch has been impressed with his freshman, and has great things to say about Johnson.

"Colin is a freshman that plays like an upperclassman because he doesn't make too many first year mistakes. He's a hard worker who works extremely hard in practice. The players know that they can count on his support offensively and count on him to work hard," said Koch.

Even though the personalities of Jacobs and Johnson are different, the players have mutual respect for one another. Their goals for the rest of the season are the same: win.

"We have proven that we could beat any team going into the A-10 Championships. Everybody on our team has to contribute if we are going to win," said Johnson.

"Our team has to lift its game another notch. Before the season, I wanted us to be in the NCAA's. I think we can do it," said Jacobs.

folks (twice the viewership of Channel 22).

My advice is this: don't give up, you will get the hang of it. What is that saying about, "'tis nobler to try and fail a thousand times, than never to have tried at all."

Despite awful newscasts, Channel 30 WVIT has shown there is someone with a brain in their New Britain studio by coming up with the most inventive twist I have seen in years.

The "You pick the game" promotion urges viewers to call the Channel 30 studios and decide on which NFL game the network shows on Sundays. The promotion implied that the game picked by the most viewers will be shown every week. That's what I like to see, democracy in action.

Oh, how the mighty Patriots have fallen. WVIT must be getting killed by WSFB channel 3's CBS telecasts, facilitating this change. I just want to know how many of you wiseguys out there will spend the dime to demand the exciting Indianapolis-Miami matchup. Better yet, Cleveland-N.E.

Am I alone, or has the CBS "big fan", (Cro-Magnon man, according to our own Mr. Crofts) grown on you, too?

Jacobs and Johnson earn duel award

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

Roommates are supposed to communicate off the field, but when it comes to Randy Jacobs and Colin Johnson, this pair communicates on the field as well.

These two combined this past weekend for six goals (three for each player) to help the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team clinch a spot in the Atlantic 10 post-season with two key wins, earning Jacobs and Johnson Collegian Co-Athlete of the Week.

Jacobs, a junior forward from Trenton, N.J., could be compared to "Prime Time" Deion Sanders, since he is outspoken on his talent and ability to score. He is very confident on and off the field, and his play earned him Atlantic 10 Player of the Week.

Jacobs has been playing soccer since he was five years old, not uncommon for successful players. He credits his father for getting him started at such a young age.

"My father brought me up in soccer and he was my coach through my younger years up until high school," said Jacobs.

When Jacobs arrived at Hamilton High, he decided to play three sports: basketball, tennis, and soccer. However, he always knew that soccer would be what could get him to the next level, which was college.

Since he lived in N.J., it would have been possible for him to play his sport at Rutgers University, which in the past had been known more for its soccer program than here at UMass.

"Rutgers was a possibility, but I didn't really want to play more soccer in New Jersey. I've done that my whole life. I wanted to bring my talent to another state," Jacobs said.

Now to the present, where Jacobs is a prominent scorer on a successful UMass team, led by head coach Sam Koch. Koch was not here when Jacobs was a freshman, but from his sophomore to his junior year, he has seen a change in his forward, and is impressed.

"Randy is doing simple things extremely well, and his finishes are outstanding. I'm really pleased with his attitude and work ethic. He has developed into a great player," said Koch.

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

Randy Jacobs (right) and Colin Johnson of the UMass men's soccer team were named Collegian Co-Athletes of the Week for their performance this past weekend against St. Joseph's and Hofstra.

On the other hand, Jacobs' roommate and complement, Colin Johnson, could be compared to Walter Payton. He is often quiet, receives the recognition, but remains within himself about his abilities.

Johnson, a freshman forward from Yorktown Heights, N.Y., has started every game this season for UMass, and his play has been rewarded. He has been named A-10 Freshman of the Week for the second time this year.

Johnson's father taught him the game of soccer at a very young age, when Colin attended his soccer camps all the way up until high school.

Back in high school, Johnson played lacrosse as well as soccer. However, he stopped participating in lacrosse when he realized soccer was his sport.

"A lot of my buddies from high school are now competing in lacrosse at big time schools, and they ask me why I gave it up. I just tell them it was for soccer," said Johnson.

When it came time to choosing a college, Johnson had several options, including national soccer powers Duke and South Carolina.

"Duke and South Carolina showed interest in me by talking to the coach of my club team back home. However, I wanted to come in and play and have an impact.

Water polo sweeps five games at Harvard

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

BOSTON—A year ago at this time the University of Massachusetts water polo team was in serious trouble. They had just lost to perennial eastern power Brown University in double overtime in the first round of the New England Championships at Harvard. The Bears beat the Minutemen later in the year to win the N.E title.

This past weekend the same tournament produced very different results as UMass won all five of their games, including a convincing 7-3 win over 18th-ranked Brown Saturday afternoon. The Minutemen are now 21-1 and ranked 14th nationally. Yarworth said the team could possibly move up if a team above them falters.

"At this point last year, we lost it," said UMass senior driver Scott Reed. "This year we didn't. We stayed on top. I think this is the biggest game of the year."

It was, and the Minutemen played it as such.

"The whole team was great," said assistant coach Dan Margulis, who was acting as head coach as Russ Yarworth attended his sister's wedding. "It was a real team effort and that's why we're so good this year."

Jeremy Alters got UMass off on the right foot as 50 seconds into the game he tossed in a nice backhand curl. A little more than two minutes later Reed banked one in off the right post.

The Bears scored the next three goals over a span of three minutes, and just when UMass seemed on the verge of packing it in, Javier Gonzalez scored with three minutes left in the half, putting new life into the Minutemen.

A minute later Tsan Engin scored to make the score 4-3. The killing blow was another Engin score with less than a minute left. Gonzalez took a shot at the end of the shot clock, and when the Brown goalie didn't hold on to it, Engin pounced on the rebound and put it home, and basically put the game out of reach.

UMass' active, pressing defense held the Bears scoreless in the second half. Third period goals by Gonzalez and freshman Fransisco Mariani iced the win.

Freshman goalie Alex Mujica made four saves in the fourth quarter on his way to a game total of nine.

Harvard put a scare into the Minutemen Saturday morning as they controlled play in the first half and enjoyed a 4-2 lead at the break. Unfortunately for the Crimson, UMass had a third period slaughter planned. Gonzalez scored three times in the period, and Alters and Pat Lau added one each as the Minutemen went up 7-5 in what Yarworth termed as the best quarter of polo the team has played all season.

Engin and Gonzalez scored in the fourth period to put the game out of reach. Mujica recorded eight saves.

Friday night the Minutemen recorded a 15-8 victory over the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Tsan Engin had four goals and Todd Hourihan had four saves.

Sunday morning they dispatched of Boston College 14-6 as Reid notched four goals. Hourihan replaced Mujica in net and made nine saves.

The Minutemen closed the weekend Sunday afternon by beating Yale 12-3. Gonzales had three goals while Hourihan had an easy day in net, notching three saves.

GAME NOTES - The team really seems to be clicking, and, unlike past years, has confidence in the big games. Even after being down at the half to Harvard and down 3-2 to Brown, the Minutemen didn't panic.

"What we're seeing now is if a team doesn't come to play us for four quarters, they are not going to win," Yarworth said.

This weekend the Minutemen are hosting Army at Amherst College in the season's last home away from home game.

The good, the bad, and the ugly of TV sports

Michael MORRISSEY

To those of you who cannot read the bendee, I am not Jeff Crofts, I am simply filling in for my esteemed colleague, who will be back later in the week.

This is the first TV sports column of the year. This column has three purposes: A) to take up a huge amount of space on the sportspage; B) To quiet those who incessently ask, "So Mike, what did you do this weekend?"; C) To (hopefully) entertain the reader.

First of all, five of the six American League Championship Series games were broadcast during the day. I don't know who said a prayer to the television gods, but it worked. They relented. The fact that Toronto-Oakland Part I (back in 1989) was one of the worst series ever in terms of ratings might have had something to do with it.

Or it could be the simple fact that the Eye wanted to showcase America's Team, Atlanta, during prime time. But wait, what important things do South Carolinian Braves fans do during the day before WTBS comes on? My best guess would be something involving fireworks, firearms, or Fireball brand moonshine.

Anyway, the Braves have picked up a national audience, and the Braves-Pirates playoff series got a better rating last year than the Blue Jays-Twins. Besides, Oakland is in the Pacific time zone, which facilitated the daytime coverage even more.

Getting to the men themselves, Sean McDonough and Tim McCarver have done an excellent job, and McDonough's call at the end of NLCS Game 7 was memorable.

The action didn't end on the field for McCarver, either. He was doused, as I am sure you all heard, with cold water and ice by poor sport Deion Sanders. It seems Sanders was unhappy with McCarver's description of Deion's two-sport Sunday showcase as "a selfish act."

That wasn't all, though. Sunday, McCarver bent over backwards to sound like Mr. Niceguy with respect to Sanders. Yeah, Tim, we didn't think you'd be that objective. It's obvious that the tail is wagging the dog in TV land and players dictate what is and is not said.

It seems nobody cares about the World Series anyway because of the late start of the first pitch. Newspaper editors are cursing CBS under their collective breath because the games have exceeded deadline on the East coast. In other words, forget about actually reading about any of the games in the morning.

McDonough and McCarver's handling of Ed Sprague's game-winning home run in Toronto's Game 2 5-4 win was weak at best. Sprague's dinger rocketed out of Atlanta's Fulton County Stadium before McDonough could even get a word out. Hey Sean, were you really that shocked that former Red Sox reliever Jeff Reardon could give up a ninth inning homer?

To top it off, CBS made Sprague's noteworthy homer ridiculous by harping on the fact that wife Kristen Babb-Sprague won a gold medal in synchronized swimming.

Not only did they flash to Babb-Sprague every minute, but they described in detail during the ninth inning of the World Series how a scoring error gave the swimmer the medal over a Canadian and caused commotion in Toronto. If you thought it was boring to read just now, imagine how it sounded on air!

Let's run down other action on TV this weekend.

Game of the Week: Saturday's Boston College-Penn State game on ABC. Not only did many viewers get to see the Eagles nationally for the first time this year, they also saw BC do what no team has done in 23 years: beat the Nittany Lions at Homecoming. A heartstopper down to the wire gets my pick.

Worst game ever shown on television: This one also goes to ABC, the second half of Saturday's college football double header. Michigan was leading Indiana 31-3 at halftime in a game noone from New England cares about (where was the Tennessee-Alabame game? I don't have pay per view!), and there was no scoring whatsoever in the second half. 'Nuff said.

Other lowlights: CBS superstar John Madden made not one but two mistakes in Sunday's Redskin's 16-12 win over the Eagles. Not only did Madden insist for three minutes that up 16-3, the Eagles could only tie the game with two touchdowns, but he also said Washington linebacker Wilber Marshall used to play for Pittsburgh, not Chicago, but he quickly corrected himself.

Try, try again: To those of us who have grown up in the Boston area and are accustomed to competent sportscasters, the Happy Valley is quite a shock. Although I cannot rip channel 40 because I confess to not watching SundaySports Live this weekend (my VCR must have malfunctioned!), Channel 22 gets the nod for unsolicited advice of the week.

With heavyweights such as Rich Tettemer and Bob "Let's get ready to" Rumbold at the microphone, God only knows how well the production of the UMass-UConn Homecoming football game came out. I sure don't, because I went to see the game, along with 10,900 other

Fierce race drives up large cost

By MIKE ROBINSON
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) - The presidential rivals are waging what shapes up as the costliest political advertising blitz in the history of the airwaves, spending more than $40 million on network television this fall.

From pro football games to prime-time sitcoms, presidential ads are everywhere and will be until election eve, when the rivals are expected to air 20- to 30-minute final appeals at a rate of almost $1 million an hour.

Beyond that, President Bush and Gov. Bill Clinton are pouring millions more into a barrage of radio ads and local TV spots in key battleground states.

"If the opposition is doing it, you're afraid not to do it, that's what drives the spending up," said Professor Herbert Alexander of the University of Southern California, an authority on campaign spending.

What are viewers seeing?

Bush's latest ad show a Time magazine cover with Clinton's face and the headline: "Why voters don't trust Clinton." Perot has been running half-hour spots laying out the country's economic problems and his proposed solutions. Clinton's first network ad aired Thursday night. It shows Bush telling voters in 1988 they would would be better off with him as president. "How are you doing?" it asks.

Spending on network ads this year has easily outpaced four years ago. At this time in 1988, for example, ABC had taken in a total of $5.9 million from Bush and Democrat Michael Dukakis in post-convention ad money, compared with $19 million so far this year from Bush, Clinton and Perot.

Perot's presence in the race is one reason for the higher spending levels.

Another is Bush's underdog status in most states, which has forced him to spread his message far and wide. He is talking to the networks with ads that in happier times might have been more economically targeted to key states.

"With Perot in the race, it has to be the most spending ever, no doubt about it," said Washington political consultant Vic Kamber.

"Obviously, we've taken in a lot more this year," said ABC spokes man Stephen Battaglio. The network so far has gotten $7.9 million from Bush, $10.4 million from Perot and $680,000 from Clinton.

"CBS was still calculating its totals at midday Tues-

Candidates' views are not clear

Millie is more well-known than death penalty issue

By GEORGE ZHU
Collegian Correspondent

While many voters are familiar with some of the more trivial aspects of the presidential campaign, their knowledge of the candidates' policies, records and the issues in general is "extremely low," according to a recent national survey.

Two University professors at the Center for Study of Communications surveyed nationwide 601 randomly selected likely voters from Oct. 6 to Oct. 9. The study, commissioned by FAIR, had a four percent margin of error.

In a news conference at Robsham Visitors Center yesterday Justin Lewis, an associate communication professor, said the main finding of their survey was "the level of knowledge about issues among the electorates seems to be very, very low." It also found avid television watchers were not more knowledgeable of the campaign issues.

"When we asked people about the issues or what the candidates stand on the issues, most people really don't know very much either about the candidates or about issues in general," Lewis said.

In the survey out of the 21 questions asking about the candidates and the issues, the average score was 32 percent in correct answers. The figure drops to 27 percent if the more trivial questions were removed, according to Lewis.

"That outlines how low the score [was]," Lewis added.

When it comes to more trivial issues, the survey found "people are better informed" than with more substantial issues.

About 86 percent of those surveyed said they knew the Bush family has a dog named Millie, while only 15 percent know that both Bush and Clinton support the death penalty, and less than five percent are aware that both candidates have proposed cutting capital gains taxes, according to the study.

Olver's staffer caught listening in private talk

By TRUDY TYNAN
Associated Press

U.S. Rep. John Olver has publicly apologized after one of his staffers taped a private conversation between a reporter and a Democratic supporter of his Republican challenger.

The apology was the second in quick succession that Olver has had to make for campaign gaffes.

Michael Meehan, Olver's press secretary, blamed the latest incident on "a young and overly aggressive campaign staffer" and said Tuesday that Olver had also personally apologized to Leominster City Councilman Kevin Cormier and Tracy Seelye, a reporter for the Sentinel & Enterprise of Fitchburg.

"It's an unfortunate error that we regret," Meehan said. "The campaign staff is supposed to do their best for the candidate. But its clear that on two occasions last week the staff let John Olver down."

On Thursday, Olver had to apologize to Republican Patrick Larkin for falsely accusing him of having a no-show job with a conservative New Jersey congressman at the same time he was chief of staff for the late U.S. Rep. Silvio Conte. Olver succeeded Conte, who represented the district for 32 years, in a special election following Conte's death in 1991.

The Amherst Democrat initially stood by his claim despite Larkin's denials. He issued the apology after a check of social security numbers showed that a different Patrick J. Larkin had worked for a former U.S. Rep. James Courter and Courter confirmed that his Patrick Larkin was now living in California.

Cormier, a Democrat, who supports Larkin, said that he and Seelye exchanged pleasantries as they walked down a hotel hallway in Fitchburg last Wednesday after leaving a private fund raiser for Larkin hosted by U.S. Rep. Warren Rudman, R-New Hampshire.

"[Seelye] had her notebook in her purse and her car keys in her hand. It was clearly a private conversation," Cormier said.

"As we were walking down the hall we noticed a woman following us with a tape recorder held down by her side. But I didn't think anything of it because a lot of out-of-town press were at the fund raiser and a number of them had tape recorders."

Campaign showdown

Bush is bustling to bypass Clinton

By TOM RAUM
Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. - President Bush will be trying in the final two-week campaign stretch to shore up his weakened base and sustain the aggressive stance he struck in the final debate. Bill Clinton's goal is to preserve his double-digit lead.

News Analysis

As Bush began a final blitz to save his presidency, the Arkansas governor, brimming with fresh confidence, worked the pivotal Midwest and plotted to extend his margin into Western states that have been traditional Republican turf.

The two will spend much of the campaign end game fighting in the industrial battleground states - where Clinton now enjoys a comfortable lead - and swamping the airways with their ads.

Many analysts have suggested there's not enough time left for Bush to mount a comeback and the die may already be cast for a decisive Clinton win.

And, even Republican strategists promoting a come-from-behind victory for Bush acknowledge it is a long shot.

With the three debates over, both major-party candidates on Tuesday signaled the likely course of the rest of the campaign.

Independent challenger Ross Perot, still the third man out, planned to stick to his strategy - spending tens of millions of dollars of his own money buying television time but otherwise staying out of public view.

"I'm going to keep fighting," Clinton said as he campaigned in Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin. "I have the best economic plan. That's what I'll hammer home these last two weeks."

Clinton campaigned in Illinois and Wisconsin before a swing through Western states that were once Republican bastions - including Wyoming and Nevada. The trip underscored the confidence that was spreading through the Clinton campaign.

UMass students tutor one-to-one with youths

By SANDRA ROSE

The Youth Empowerment Program, a volunteer tutorial program for junior and senior high school students in the Amherst community, began Monday. The tutors are students from the University of Massachusetts.

"This is a supplemental program that gets kids interested in their own development and encourages them to be better students," Professor Nicholas McBride, director of the program and a parent with his own son in the program, said.

The students relate to college tutors on a one-to-one basis and bridges the gap between the necessity of school, according to Joseph Bennett, a parent and student at UMass.

"We are providing students with guidance and assistance. They just need some motivation," Jessica Broomfield, tutor and senior at UMass, said.

"I can relate better [to college students] than to grown-ups," Paco Tolson, an 8th grader at Amherst Regional Junior High school, said.

The program was developed because students and their parents were "dissatisfied with students' ability to get what they need in the Amherst school system," McBride said.

"Students are isolated in school and it is important to make connections with the community," Peggy Perri, a parent, said. The program is designed to move kids forward, she said.

"The students know what their needs are, and they're not getting it," Janine Maland, a parent said.

"It's not that these students can't do the work. It's because they are not motivated," Bennett said.

"Teachers get frustrated when students don't learn fast enough," Jacob McBride, a 10th grader, said. He went on to explain that the tutors in the program had patience and provided the individual attention that is often lacking in the classrooms.

The focus of the program is on minority students because they are becoming "more disconnected with the school system," Bennett said, but all students are welcome.

More information about the program and volunteer information is available from Professor McBride in the journalism department.

Students join forces against racism at UM

By TROY L. MERRICK
Collegian Correspondent

About 50 people met with the Institute for the Healing of Racism last night in room 163 of the Campus Center and poured their hearts out about a topic that has acquired a lot of attention lately.

Racism is seen as one of the most challenging issues at the University of Massachusetts, said Colin Ruhe, a junior electrical engineering major.

Speaker Craig Harmsen brought up what is possibly the most pertinent obstacle to combating this social disease: denial. Harmsen spoke for about 10 minutes and then opened the forum up for audience discussion.

"Either I'm very good at these talks or you're really desperate, and I don't think I'm that good," Harmsen said, indicating the campus' need to deal with racial tensions.

Halfway through the session, the lights went out, and someone in audience said, "Now we can't see any colors."

AnneMarie Greene said that that statement in itself could have easily been the central focus of the night, and consequently, of what the population of the University of Massachusetts and of the world need to bear in mind.

The consensus of the audience members was that those who contribute to the violence and hatred are missing out on what the world could be: a society of understanding, accepting, and respect for one another for who they are, not just African-American, Caucasian, Asian, or whatever—but as individuals.

Participants agreed the revelation isn't going to come overnight, but that the message of the meeting was that of hope.

"There's something about you people that touches me," said Carlos D. Anderson, an Amherst resident, speaking to the group, which consisted of people of many ages and ethnic backgrounds. "Loving people is what's going to at least help knock out racism; it's working for me and I know it can work for everyone."

Another key point made in the discussion was the family and its involvement in teaching positive, well-rounded understandings of people of other backgrounds.

"I grew up in Buffalo, New York, and my mother championed the 'equality of the races'," Harmsen said, "and she tried to expose me to other races."

He explained how that largely contributed to his involvement with the Institute. Many members of the group described their own experiences of discomfort in the presence of members of other races due to not having upbringing of that type.

"Sometimes when I'm with a colored person, I feel nervous because I feel I may say the wrong thing and he or she will be seriously offended," said Ruhe.

Local children to participate in campus trick-or-treat and party

By MICHELLE ROBBINS

Halloween will be a safe and enjoyable experience for many underprivileged children this year, because of a dedicated University volunteer program and two house council governments.

Volunteer Initiative Blending Education and Service has planned its third annual Halloween Trick-or-Treat in collaboration with the Grayson and Field House Councils.

Jennifer Wolcott, staff member of VIBES, said about 65 children from the Main Street Shelter in Holyoke, Jessie's House in Northampton and a group from the Boltwood Project will be participating.

"The event usually brings out more kids than the volunteers can handle, but everyone has a good time," said Wolcott.

She said about 40 students have decided to volunteer in the trick-or-treat, which will take place on Oct. 28 from 6 p.m. to 8 p.m. in the Grayson and Field residence halls.

Wolcott said anyone who has the time should volunteer. "Volunteering gives you a sense of accomplishment and makes you feel good for the rest of the week," she said.

Michael Tow, president of Grayson House Council, said the volunteers would be escorting the children to designated rooms, lounges and halls, all of which would be decorated.

"One dormitory room is going to lay mattresses on the floor and tell spooky stories to the children," he said.

Wolcott said the lounges will have apple bobbing and a game called "donuts on a string." She said there will also be a haunted path in the Orchard Hill courtyard.

Laura Rosenbaum, a staff member of VIBES, said the Halloween event gives college students a chance to make a difference in their community.

"Children receive a fun evening from positive role models and students get the opportunity to learn about themselves and help children," she said.

Wolcott said VIBES is a student program in the School of Management which helps students get placed in various volunteer organizations in the local area.

"After students volunteer they have a positive change in attitude towards the environment and their neighbors in the community," she said.

Wolcott said VIBES hosts several one-time events during the semester which are geared towards the interests of the elderly, homeless families and underprivledged children.

Wolcott said VIBES has planned a new event called "Shopping Spree" in which about 20 elderly women from Lathrop Home will go to the Hampshire Mall with SOM volunteers.

"This will give the elderly a chance to get out of the home and socialize and shop with each other," she said.

No free ride on free trade laws

By PAUL PRECHT
Collegian Correspondent

Speakers at two separate forums at the University of Massachusetts blasted the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), negotiated by the Bush administration. The agreement, pending approval by Congress, would remove barriers to trade between the US, Mexico and Canada.

Elaine Bernard, former president of the New Democratic Party in British Columbia told an audience on Monday in the Labor Center that NAFTA was an attempt to "remove sovereignty from the people and put it in something like the trade deal. Sovereignty is the right of people to democratically elect governments to enact social policy."

As an example, Bernard, currently with the Harvard Trade Union Project, said American standards for additives in food could be interpreted as a "non-tarriff barrier to trade" by a company exporting food into the US.

"One country's non-tarriff barrier is another country's social policy," she said.

Bernard quoted a Canadian trade official as saying "The trade deal limits the extent to which the US or other signatory governments can respond to pressure from their citizens."

NAFTA is part of the bipartisan "neo-liberal agenda" of "socializing costs and privatizing benefits," Bernard said. The benefits from NAFTA will go to transnational corporations who move to Mexico because of its cheap labor and lax environmental controls. The losers will be Canadian, US and Mexican workers, according to Bernard.

Between 290,000 and 490,000 American jobs will be lost by the year 2000 if NAFTA goes through, according to research presented by Mehrene Larudee, staff economist for the Center for Popular Economics, at a seminar on political economy in Thompson, Tuesday. A paper by Larudee and Skidmore professor Timothy Koechlin published in the Sept.-Oct. issue of Challenge estimates "that investment will be diverted from the United States to Mexico in an amount between $31 billion and $53 billion by the year 2000 as a result of NAFTA..."

Mexican workers will also be hurt when Mexico abolishes corn subsidies under the NAFTA agreement, Larudee's research shows. Cheap corn from the US and Canada will flood the Mexican market, forcing an estimated 700,000 peasants to head for the cities in search of work. Larudee predicts this mass exodus to the cities will increase unemployment and drive down the wages of Mexican workers. The daily wage for Mexican workers is now about equal to what American workers make in an hour.

In what Bernard calls a "circumvention of the Constitution," NAFTA has been called an "agreement" and not a "treaty." The trade deal can therefore be passed by a simple majority of both houses rather than the two-thirds of the Senate the Constitution requires for passage of treaties. Bernard says the Bush administration does not have the support to get two thirds approval. Because it has been put on "fast-track" Congress has no power to alter the text of the treaty. The Constitution allows the Senate to amend treaties.

Women and minorities need to shatter the glass ceiling

Well the third and final presidential debate just passed, and yet again gender and racial discrimination was ignored. A reporter brings up the question of minorities not holding positions above the "glass ceiling" in each candidate's administrative and campaign years and the issue is merely thrown into the trash pile of issues for later years.

George Bush immediately took on a defensive tone as he attempted to answer the question. I suppose I would too if my platform had an underlying tactic of getting women out of the boardrooms and back into the kitchen. Under his administration, a question such as the one posed would be ludicrous and irrelevant. He has made his position quite clear. Think about it: why would he allow women the power and opportunity to decide national, economic and domestic policies, when he won't even allow them the a decision about their own bodies? If women can't make a personal choice, why should they be allowed to make a political one?

Why would he allow a woman the position to make international decisions if his platform denies them the right to fight in combat? If women can't make a patriotic choice — why should they make a diplomatic one?

He managed to sputter out a few names, but that was like putting a red ribbon around a time bomb — it doesn't make it any less dangerous to believe in his promises.

He also mentioned how great it was that so many women were running for the Senate. However he doesn't want them to win because then they would represent a "liberal Congress." Well gee George, maybe that is because your ticket doesn't believe them worthy of such a nomination.

Perot really won the grand prize for hypocrisy. Here's a man who throughout the entire campaign, as problematic as it was, preached for "issues, issues, issues," yet every time someone asks him a question on discrimination he fails to answer it. I don't think anyone knows his position on these issues simply because he doesn't have one — he doesn't care enough to. Having women in his administration means to him having a wife and four daughters. These discrimination issues seem to be as irrelevant as the entire state of Arkansas.

E. C.
THOMAS

Monday night was a case in point. I don't know how Perot always manages to weasel his way around these issues, but women and minorities were quickly put aside to Saddam Hussein. It's good to know that my presence in this nation is less important than a man in the desert. I'm beginning to think that maybe the skill of his "weaselness" has something to do with those beady little eyes.

Bill Clinton was the only candidate to target the issue. His staff would represent the people of America, and you couldn't do that without women and people of color. He was also the only candidate who emphasized the fact that by employing women and people of color he wouldn't be sacrificing quality and excellence (a mistake many make when discussing affirmative action).

For once someone acknowledged the fact that they have great minds and are not to be looked upon as charity cases and pawns in the game of getting elected. Clinton is the only candidate who addresses these issues head on. He doesn't dance around it as if he were on hot coals.

Notice that neither Bush nor Perot even bothered to mention people of color. Bush and Perot all but managed to strip away any identity women and minorities have. After all we are not deserving enough to be the topic of discussion. If it wasn't for our dignity and passion for equality, they might have succeeded.

With all the discussion on "leadership," it amazes me that the candidates' attitude towards the people of America hasn't been brought up. How can you be considered a leader if you don't represent the people? If your staff is made up of White males, how can you be in touch with all the people? How can you make decisions for this country, for all people, without giving all peoples a voice in the government?

After the debate was over, I started thinking what it would've been like to have the debate on this campus. I wondered if the candidates knew what was going on — or if they even cared. I think that it would've been more than appropriate. Walking around Southwest would be like walking around the inner cities. Walking around the campus as a whole I wonder if those candidates could look us all in the eyes and tell us that things are going to change.

Then: burn your bra! Now: burn your Barbie!

Millions of little girls all over America are struggling in math classes! It's a national crisis! A disgrace! Young girls (or should that be "pre-school women"?) are being led down a monstrous path of degradation and inhuman repression to a sorry state of bottomless self-esteem and respect.

What menace is behind this hideous state of affairs?

None other than Barbie, that plastic, blond, perky pillar of American culture. This is the story:

Mark T.
WENTHAM

Mattel, the toy company that makes Barbie, has issued a statement that all Teen Talk Barbie owners who feel that her canned speech bits are sexist may exchange the little monster for a mute model.

It appears that the American Association of University Women and other politically correct watchdog groups have raised a stink over the fact that one of the lines Teen Talk Barbie mutters, "Math class is tough," may be having a negative effect on our nation's female youth by discouraging them from doing well in that subject.

Horrors! This is definitely something to get up in arms about. Throw your Barbies into the streets! Get out the lighter fluid! Watch the dark smoke of righteously burning blond and caucasian plastic rise into the sky! Liberate the world from Teen Talk Barbie and hear millions of women roar!

Do you ever get the feeling that some politically correct watchdog groups in this country have just a little too much time on their hands, or that maybe they take things just a tad too seriously? The next thing you know, some Coalition of the Repressed Voiceless of America is going to fire back at the feminist groups that it's degrading to the Special Vocal Needs people of the world to exchange the talking Barbie for (gasp!) mute ones.

In an odd way, this brings to mind an article I read last year about a team of scientists from some college who did an in-depth two year study on the navel-cleaning habits of American men. Those were education dollars that were definitely put to incredible use. Or maybe I'm not really seeing the true benefits here; I suppose to some people out there it's important to know that almost half of the men in this country never wash their bellybuttons. That's an earth-shattering statistic, one that perhaps should be addressed in the current presidential election.

The connection? Both stories make me wonder why some people don't have anything better to do with their time. Maybe that's wrong and unfair of me to think, but I guess I'll have to live with that weight on my conscience.

However, regardless of the fact that some of the other things Teen Talk Barbie says include, "Let's start a business," and "I'm going to be a veterinarian," the AAUW and others really seem to feel the need to spend time going after this particular cause. I don't know; perhaps Barbie saying, "Math class is tough," really could adversely affect the performance of young girls in math classes in some remote, minor way.

It just seems that there are bigger fish to fry out there.

Yes, "politically correct" and all that is important and good, but as with anything, you can go too far, get too serious, become "politically maniacal," as it were. A sense of humor is a really wonderful thing, and getting more rare by the day, it seems.

The sad and unexpected thing about the P.C. movement is that instead of becoming a more unified and equal culture — the driving theme behind this new awareness — we've become more and more fractured because everybody is so busy bitching at each other.

And instead of instilling a sense of strength and self-respect amongst ourselves, we've become a nation of victims and whiners, with a lot of people afraid to talk anymore lest they say something, innocently or not, that will offend somebody's "P.C." sensibilities. Hell, if Barbie is under attack, can anybody be spared?

I can just see a little elementary kid at recess somewhere saying to his friends, "Why did the chicken cross the road? To get to the other —" and being swooped down upon by some adult member of the Society for Oppressed Fowl to be dragged off to the principal's office and suspended for a week for making obscene chicken harassment jokes. Are we far away from such a scene?

In the meantime, however, is you are female and you're struggling with math, perhaps it would be a good idea to go to your therapist and talk about Barbie. You can't get a refund for Teen Talk Barbie, but you can exchange it for one with Special Vocal Needs.

And if you're male, perhaps you might want to wash your bellybutton the next time you take a shower. After all, it's only P.C. to have a clean navel.

Bush plays "Commie pinko" card

As students planned their Columbus Day picnics and plotted the overthrow of the chancellor, I sat and laughed aloud as I read the Boston Globe. The subject was "Chicken" George Bush's latest desperate campaign ploy, accusing Democratic nominee Bill Clinton of being unpatriotic by participating in anti-war demonstrations while a student in London.

Bush stated, "I don't understand mobilizing demonstrations against your own country. I don't think you should do that. That's what gets me." Well, George, I don't think you should give weapons technology to Saddam Hussein, a "New Hitler" you called him, while he's gassing his own people. That's right, our patriotic prez was allotting funds for Iraq in 1988 for their war against Iran with the knowledge that Hussein was gassing the Kurds. I don't think the president should promise in his election campaign to not raise taxes, then raise them anyway. I don't think he should ignore problems such as AIDS, racism, declining education funds, homophobia, a disgusting health care system and violence against women while parading around the world under the flag of the "New World Order." Does that phrase sound familiar? It should. It's how Hitler described his vision of Europe when he was done conquering it.

The Bush camp also suggested that a trip to Moscow by Clinton was arranged by the KGB. George, my friend, you are truly a desperate man. Are you so afraid to discuss your poor economic policies, your "great" rapport with disenfranchised voters, your pre-Panama invasion relationship with Manuel Noriega and a host of other failed policies, that you are bringing McCarthyism back? I guess so. The Bush camp also raised questions about Clinton's involvement in demonstrations in London, and his attendance at a "closed door meeting in early 1969 in Martha's Vineyard during which anti-war strategy was discussed and nation-wide marches and protests were planned." So what? Besides the fact that it was a reunion for Eugene McCarthy supporters I don't see the problem with organizing a peace rally. I guess that makes Clinton an evil man. California Republican Rep. Robert Dornan was quoted as saying: "He [Clinton] was a 'peace worker.'" Wow! Really? Was he? So I guess that makes you a "War Maker," huh Bob? Bush also complained (what else is new) that "nobody is asking" Clinton about his trip to Moscow. Well, maybe because no one cares except you, George.

The only reason the Bushsters have come up with this strategy is because Bush is trailing in the polls and the numbers are dropping weekly. Desperate times call for desperate acts. This is the last at-bat for Bush and I'm sorry to say, George ol' buddy, you've been struck out. Bush seems to think he can mouth off about someone's personal business without the facts: "I don't want to tell you what I really think because I don't have the facts." Well, George, since you won't say what you really think, then I will. Read my lips. Start packing!

This week's fine cinema from HSCN

By JAMIE GORNSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Hello, movie lovers! For those of you who can't get enough of Christian Slater, I have some good news for you! He's hot. He's happening. And, he's here on HSCN for another week in two flicks, The Legend Of Billie Jean, and Pump Up the Volume. Yes, these are all repeats, but they're good ones, so sit tight. For those of you who don't like Christian Slater, there's plenty of other movies for you to relax and enjoy. Now here are the movies that will be shown beginning on Wednesday, October 21.

Flatliners—Kiefer Sutherland, Julia Roberts, Kevin Bacon. It takes an interesting and intriguing idea of med students experiencing their own death and then being brought back to life. It completely loses that idea. It's confusing. It's stupid in parts. And, it begins to make absolutely no sense. Roberts is not at her best, and Bacon does not act up to his full potential. Sutherland is pretty good, and the fancy camerawork is a saving grace, but you really have to pay attention to get it. But, do you really want to? *1/2

Flowers in the Attic—Victoria Tennant, Kristy Swanson, Jeb Stuart Adams. This movie does absolutely no justice to the book from which it was adapted. The story line is changed to the point where avid V.C. Andrews readers like myself are upset at the producers. The children in the book are supposed to be breathtakingly beautiful, as their mother. To put it mildly, the actors are a bunch of dogs. Woof! Usually pretty Kristy Swanson looks frumpy and over acts so badly, you just want to wince. And, what trash barrel did they scrape to find the ogre that plays the older brother Chris? Ugh. Don't get me started. NO STARS!!!

Hot Shots—Charlie Sheen, Lloyd Bridges, Valerina Golino. Finally! A funny movie. It's a take off on Top Gun, 9 1/2 Weeks, and a few others thrown in there. It's a traditionally slapstick Zucker movie, in the same pattern as Airplane! and the The Naked Gun. A few scenes are hysterical, and there's one or two where I was literally on the floor. If you haven't seen it, you really should. What the heck, the cable's already paid for, right? ***

The Hunt for Red October— Sean Connery, Alec Baldwin. It is the outstanding screen adaptation of Clancy's bestseller. A Soviet submarine captain (Connery) may or may not be trying to defect, and an American intelligence (somewhat of an oxymoron, isn't it? — just kidding) agent (Baldwin) tries to predict Connery's every step. Another brilliant performance by Connery.*

Iron Eagle—Louis Gossett, Jr., Jason Gedrick, David Suchet. Oooh boy, here's another one where you shouldn't get me started. Nice premise...an 18 year-old gum chewing, walkman toting, rock 'n roll loving kid flies a — get this — F-16 fighter jet to the Middle East to save his POW dad. (Gratuitous vomiting) Oh, sure. Makes sense to me, how about you? What a waste of time for Gossett. NO STARS.

The Legend of Billie Jean—Helen Slater, Keith Gordon, Christian Slater. A pretty decent movie about a group of Texas teens who are on the run after a girl (Helen Slater) and her brother (Christian Slater) are unjustly accused of crimes they did not commit, spurred by a misunderstanding over a motorbike. The two, as well as a couple of their friends, are turned into local heroes for standing up for what they believe. Christian Slater is adorable with his naturally blond hair, and Keith Gordon (Christine) does some pretty good acting. **

Permanent Record— Alan Boyce, Keanu Reeves, Michelele Meyrink. Very important film about teenage suicide. Acting is especially potent by Keanu Reeves who plays the best friend of Boyce, the untimely suicide victim. It's a downer for sure, but it portrays a message not to be taken lightly. ***

Pump up the Volume—Christian Slater, Ellen Greene, Scott Paulin. Slater plays a young rebel, who is fed up with society and deals with it by making his own radio show. By dominating the airwaves, he creates much perpetual confusion and outrage to parents, but surprises and delights teenagers. ***

Say Anything—John Cusack, Ione Skye, John Mahoney. Touching and very real story about a blossoming relationship between the class outcast and the class brain. An emotional subplot involves the deterioration of Skye's relationship with her father. It's a tearjerker, a heartwarmer, a comedy. Add some great music, and what more could you ask for? 1/2

Working Girl— Melanie Griffith, Harrison Ford, Sigourney Weaver. Cute film about a smart, ambitious secretary who can't get a break into the "big time" jobs, until she manages to outwit her sly, villainous boss, played superbly by Weaver. The ending is predictable, but hey, you'll like it. Griffith is so, well, cutesie that you can't help but love her character.

Warning Signs—Sam Waterston, Kathleen Quinlan, Yaphet Kotto. Less than mediocre film about the horrific results of a chemical spill at a government research plant. Does that sound like the plot of every movie? Isn't someone always spilling something toxic that the government is trying to cover up? Give mea real plot, and give me one now. *

Project X— Matthew Broderick, Helen Hunt, Bill Sadler. Very enjoyable story with a Disney like ending about a military pilot wishful, who is assigned to teach chimps how to fly simulated planes. Broderick discovers a dark secret, however, and is enraged when he realizes that the chimps are being subjected to more than just flying lessons. The chimps are a delight to watch. ***

Movies on HSCN this week but are not reviewed are Addams Family, Blue Velvet, Grand Canyon, Muppets Take Manhattan, My Other Husband, Night Patrol, Shining Through, Urban Cowboy, Welcome Home Roxie Carmichael, and Young Visitors.

"If White people can walk on the moon, then there shall be nothing that Black people cannot accomplish here on this earth." -Martin F. Jones

We must continue to fulfill our mission

Martin F. JONES

Who are we and why are we here?

To most of the students, faculty and administrators at this university we represent a small minority of people whose presence is silently tolerated.

To our communities back home we represent hope. During a time when there are more of our men in prison than in college, we are also a tiny minority among our own people.

Education has always been the key to success in any given society. For our community, access to this opportunity has been a constant struggle. At one point in time we were completely banned from all forms of literacy. In Little Rock, Arkansas, armed soldiers once stood in the way of our children as they sought to achieve this opportunity.

Generations later, we continue to be confronted with continuing barriers to our progress. In the 1960s, the number of students of color at UMass could be counted on one hand. This eventually changed in 1967 with the creation of CCEBMS, the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students. This recruitment program would become responsible for opening the door of opportunity for thousands of students of color over the past 25 years. Since then, those students have left a permanent imprint on this campus. From the establishment of the New Africa House and Black Studies Program in 1970, the creation of the Black Affairs Page nearly two decades ago, the founding of the Malcom X Cultural Center in the mid-70s and the 1992 establishment of the Black Student Union, we have continued to change this campus to best suit our needs as people of color.

And the struggle continues.

22 years ago, this campus found itself in a situation not far removed from the most recent racial attacks on our community. One evening in February, 1970, a group of Black students were walking past a fraternity house where a party had just broken up. These students suddenly became the target of several of the White fraternity brothers and were attacked. Some friends of the Black students went out and found some of these fraternity brothers alone and beat them soundly. This ultimately led to a full scale riot outside of Mills House, a dormitory in Central.

At the conclusion of this battle, the Black students retreated into the dorm, barricaded the doors, and warned all of the White students to stay in their room. They stayed locked in their rooms for several hours, "fearing for their lives." Lengthy negotiations ensued, and the White residents of Mills House were eventually relocated to other residence halls on campus.

For some strange reason this all sounds very familiar. Remember that the administration has been here a lot longer than you and I. They remembered Mills House that fateful Thursday night that Black students took over Washington tower. Twenty-two years later, history nearly repeated itself.

Today, you may know Mills house by its new name, the New Africa House. It is the center for Black academic and administrative services at UMass. Following the occupation, Black students successfully acquired the building to be used permanently as a Black academic and cultural center. This is the result of the struggle of those thatcame before us.

To all the freshmen who hate it here, realize that there are others from our community that experienced the same racism then that we feel today. Many of them did get discouraged and eventually left the university. Others stayed.

They would not be moved from this opportunity which is their birthright. They stayed and maintained their presence here. They made the change that we benefit from today. We must not be driven away either. The ultimate objective of these racists is to make things so unbearable for us that we leave.

Well, there is a rule that all of us must keep in mind: Stay away from those things which our enemy encourages us to embrace, drugs, illiteracy, violence and hate against each other, wasteful consumption from which he profits, careers in sports and entertainment which offer us no real power, and the loss of self knowledge that results from opportunistic assimilation.

Then there are those things that our enemy tries to drive us from: good health, education, love and respect for one another, economic investment in our own communities, true professional careers that empower our race and self-knowledge. We must continue to strive towards these goals and never give up on our struggle to obtain them.

As students of color at a predominately White institution, we must not forget that we are the privileged few that have been allowed through this particular door of opportunity. We have in our hands a power that most of our people do not. Therefore, it is up to us to persevere and complete our education here, so that we make take our skills and talents back to our community and rebuild it. We must not be lured aside by opportunism. We have to be smart enough, strong enough, and sure enough of ourselves to meet this challenge. That is our mission.

Martin F. Jones is the Black Affairs Editor at the Collegian.

Cultural events should receive higher priority

Yvette BAEZ

As the semester progresses, we are feeling the stress of midterms and looking forward to the sacred Thanksgiving break. Our strenuous weekly schedules often leave us anxiously awaiting the weekend. For many minority students, our salvation is the weekend social events at the Malcolm X Cultural Center.

The center is supposed to focus on cultural awareness and education, sometimes fused into a social event. What is happening to our culture? Too many organizations that utilize the Malcolm X Center's facilities are focusing their events solely on profit. I am not criticizing their need for money (an organization cannot function without some form of funding) but, it is possible to have a party with a cultural theme or an educational component. It would be good to leave a party feeling you've accomplished more than just the need for a shower.

I highly commend those cultural and Greek organizations who do devote their time and energy to give us a better understanding of ourselves and our community. To those who have yet to explore the possibilities that exist when utilizing the Malcolm X and other cultural centers, please do so.

On a campus this large, it is enlightening to learn more of our African-American and Afro-Carribean cultures, among many others.

Yvette Baez is the Public Affairs Director at the Malcolm X Cultural Center

Entertaining Mr. Sloane

Students put show on in Hampden Theatre

By EMILY MARINO
Collegian Staff

Good, old American ingenuity is well at work in the valley. Just ask Corey Pearlstein of Hampshire Independent Productions what it's like to undertake a major theatrical production without the sponsorship of a single college department or affiliation with a well-known organization. That's one way to learn about ingenuity — through homemade art.

With the help of University of Massachusetts Residential Arts, Pearlstein and the small ensemble of Hampshire Independent Productions are able to produce and bring us Joe Orton's Entertaining Mr. Sloane.

"In a valley that has five colleges it is still very difficult for smaller theater groups to compete with the college departments and professional groups in a way so that something is not sacrificed from the project," director Pearlstein said. "With all of the complications of student directing, writing, and producing, what is often lost is the quality of the experience."

Pearlstein credits Bob Antil and Eugene Warner of UMass Residential Arts in making HIP's Entertaining Mr. Sloane possible.

The small ensemble of actors and production assistants is comprised of students from both UMass and Hampshire College, and has been working diligently together in the past months to create what Pearlstein believes is "a strong ensemble feel."

The result, he feels, is a production of Orton's dark comedy relaying the experiences of sociopaths, matriarchs, and homosexuals which will "force the audience with words and by power of action into self-examination."

Entertaining Mr. Sloane was Joe Orton's first full length play. Orton, born in 1933 in Leicester, England, went to the Royal Academy of Dramiatic Arts where he developed a passion for writing. Orton co-wrote various novels and other works with his lover and later, murderer, Kenneth Halliwell.

Orton's solo works include The Ruffian on the Stairs, What the Butler Saw, Loot and such projects as a screenplay for the Beatles (which was never produced).

Do not miss this moving performance tonight at 8 p.m. in Hampden Theatre.

The show runs from tonight until Saturday. Tickets are available at the UMass Fine Arts Center Box Office and the Hampshire College Snack Bar for $4/$2 with ID.

didn't get what they wanted.

It's more than just a team or something to do on Sunday, it's civic pride. It's revenue from visitors. It's national exposure, even if your team does poorly. Would anyone know Foxboro from a hole in the wall if it weren't for the Patriots? No, and even though the Pats have been a major pain in the neck for Foxboro residents for 20-odd years (traffic problems, no Monday night games, police protection), you can bet the town has it's fingers crossed that "Curious George" Orthwein won't pack the team in the back of his pick-up truck and say "Meet me in St. Louis."

One last thing: speaking of the Patriots, I doubt there's any football fans here who will doubt the following statement: the Boston College Eagles would have a better-than-average chance of beating the Patsies on any given day. Think about it: could the Pats walk into happy Valley and walk out winners? I think not.

they come, and the guard trio of Malcom Huckaby, Howard Eisley, and Gerrod Abram can shoot the lights out. If O'Brien is able to find someone to help Curley up front the Eagles could be looking at a first-division finish in the conference.

Georgetown lost Alonzo Mourning "Has Broken" to the NBA, and Mourning was the team last year. In his place comes Othella Harrington, the consensus best big freshman in college hoops. If Harrington develops the way he should then John Thompsons' Hoyas won't fall too much. However, if Harrington and his fellow frontcourt mates, Robert Churchwell, and freshman Duane Spencer struggle together, than so will the Hoyas because I could beat out Joey Brown and Irvin Church for a starting spot in the backcourt.

UConn was a dominant team at the beginning of last year. However, after going 16-1 to start the year, Jim Calhouns' Huskies packed their bags and went south for the winter. After going 4-9 in their last 13 games, the Huskies must regroup for the upcoming season. Losing mercurial guard Chris Smith doesn't help matters, but the Huskies still have talent. Donyell Marshall and Scott Burrell are too athletic and too skilled to let UConn slip to far.

Also-rans: Pitt, St. Johns, Villanova, Providence, and Miami

All Big East: center: Curley (BC), forward Walker (Seton Hall), forward Burrell (UConn), guard Moten (SU), guard Dehere (Seton Hall)

SEC: No more Shaquille, no more Wimp Sanderson, and no more of Arkansas' 40 minutes of hell. With all that said the SEC (both East and West) is still going to be fun to watch this year.

Kentucky, despite losing three starters from last years' squad, still figure to be the class of the Eastern Division.

Jamal Mashburn has shown that there isn't much he can't do on the court. He's good enough to lead the Wildcats by himself. However, Rick Pitino has returning experience in center Gimel Martinez, and guards Travis Ford and Dale Brown. Incoming frosh Rodrick Rhodes, straight out of St. Anthonys, should help Pitino up front.

Florida, not known for its basketball prowess could change this year. The Gators return a tough front line in Stacey Poole Andrew DeClercq, and undersized Hosie Grimsley. Their starting backcourt from a lazy year also returns making the Gators a rugged, experienced squad.

Tennessee returns four starters from last year. Among Wade Houstons' returnees is his son, Allan Houston. Houston a 6'6" shooting guard can light it up from anywhere and will have to be the leader for the Volunteers.

Rest of the East: Georgia (could surprise), Vanderbilt, and South Carolina

Alabama can win the West if the players react well to new coach David Hobbs. Shooting guard James "Hollywood" Robinson is an incredible talent and if he can keep his explosiveness within the teams' framework, then the Crimson Tide could do some damage. If not, Alabama will spiral downward.

Arkansas will have to start from scratch after losing four starters, three of whom were NBA first round draft picks. Coach Nolan Richardson will have to make due with incoming freshman forward Corliss Williamson, who plays a big game at 6'7", and a trio of seniors who took a backseat to the aforementioned graduates. The Razorbacks are another team who could rise or fall.

Mississippi State, Auburn, and Mississippi all return four or five starters and this experience could bode well for all three.

LSU lost the Shaq so watch for Dale Browns' club to drop. The Tigers do ha ve some talented guards but they'll still fall some. Fear not Tiger fans, Randy Livingston will be in Baton Rouge next year.

All-SEC: center: Charles Claxton (Georgia), forward: Mashburn (KU), Wesley Person (Auburn), guard: Houston (TU), guard: Robinson (Alabama)

Soccer squads kick back into action

• Men clinch A-10 berth, host Huskies

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

It seems like its deja vu all over again.

The last time the University of Massachusetts' men's soccer team won two games in a row before this past weekend was back in September, during the streak to start the season. After defeating Holy Cross and Atlantic 10 foe Rhode Island, Sam Koch's team traveled to New England rival Dartmouth, with the Big Green leaving the Minutemen stunned with their first loss of the season.

Today at 3:00 p.m., enter the University of Connecticut, another New England team looking to end the winning streak of the Minutemen. UMass (8-4-1) is coming off an A-10 win over St. Joseph's 4-2 and a non-conference 5-2 win over Hofstra, similar circumstances to the last winning streak.

The Huskies (4-9-2) come to Garber Field on a down note, after losing two road games over the weekend to Pittsburgh 1-0 and Georgetown 3-2.

Before the trip south, UConn entertained Providence, who has already beaten UMass here in Amherst 2-1. The Huskies pummeled the Friars 5-0, proving that their overall record is misleading.

UConn possesses a balanced scoring attack, similar to that of the Minutemen. Erik Barbieri leads the team with 19 points (seven goals, five assists). After Barbieri, the next three scoring leaders are separated by five points.

A bombardier for the Huskies is Wolde Harris, who has taken a monstrous 40 shots in 15 games. He has totaled six goals and three assists.

Sniper Mike Saunders has been an offensive threat throughout his career, scoring 12 goals and seven assists.

The keeper for the Huskies, Sloan Spaeth, is strong as well, having started every game for his team this season. Through 15 games, Spaeth is giving up 1.56 goals/game, making 82 saves on the season.

"UConn is an extremely dangerous team," Koch said.

UMass lost co-captain Shawn Bleau for the season over the weekend, and some holes have to be filled. When it comes to leadership and ability, co-captain Todd Kylish feels that the team will miss Bleau, and they owe him something.

"We have dedicated the rest of the season to him (Bleau), because he was our leader, and we lost him," Kylish said.

Kylish and the rest of the Minutemen decided that someone would play wearing

• Women take on weak URI squad

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

After 12 days of inaction the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team will look to get back to its winning ways today when it faces the University of Rhode Island.

The Minutewomen (11-2) took the layoff to rest and heal both physically and mentally.

"We were beat up," Massachusetts coach Jim Rudy, who has vowed not to shave until his team wins again, said. "We had 13 games in a short period of time and we needed to rest mentally as well as physically."

Massachusetts, ranked No. 11 nationally, will face a weak URI (3-12) team before meeting rival Connecticut, in Storrs Conn., on Saturday. UConn is ranked first in the north and No. 3 nationally.

"Record wise Rhode Island is our weakest opponent but since we've lost two in a row we can't take it for granted," Rudy said.

Rudy also can not take his teams health for granted as UMass will likely play without three regular contributors, including leading scorer Kim Eynard.

Eynard is out with a hip-pointer and is questionable for the UConn game. Also injured is forward Polly Hackathorn (knee), who is out indefinitely and sweeper Lisa Mickelson (upper thigh), who is day to day.

Rudy will move midfielder Paula Wilkins back to defense and rely on freshman Rachel LeDuc and Savia Baron to step up and perform.

"The freshman are going to have to play," Rudy said. "If they have been doing there part and training hard all year we shouldn't have a problem."

URI has bigger problems. The Rams have been outscored 61 to 16 this season and been outclassed by UConn (10-0), Brown (7-0) and Boston College (7-0) thus far.

The Rams are lead by sophomore forward Stephanie Spooner who has five goals on the year amd senior midfielder Eileen Ganzhorn.

"Spooner is skillful, she can be dangerous," Rudy said. "Ganzhorn is a rugged defender who I consider the key to their team."

URI coach Karen Parker, "UMass is a great challenge for us. They are a very talented, top ranked team, but our players usually rise up to play top teams. It is good to play UMass because it shows our players where we want to take our program."

Yankee Conference notebook

Assencoa, Ingoglia bring home weekly awards

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

The 1992 University of Massachusetts football season has reached its midpoint, and the Minutemen have surprised everyone by jumping out of the gate with a 4-1 (3-1 Yankee Conference) start.

Mike Hodges and company have now won four in a row, and this Saturday face perhaps the biggest game of the 1992 season when Andy Talley and the Villanova Wildcats roll into Amherst for a 1:30 showdown at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

The Minutemen have moved up to No. 5 in this week's Lambert-Meadowlands Poll, given annually to the best Div. 1-AA football team in the East.

Speaking of the 'Cats, they were on the short end of a 21-20 decision this past weekend in Villanova, as Delaware grabbed sole possession of the top spot in the conference.

Delaware is now in the driver's seat for the YanCon Beanpot, with their three remaining YanCon opponents being Connecticut, Maine, and Richmond.

Richmond has stunned everyone in the YanCon by jumping into second place on the heels of a 4-1 conference mark.

The Spiders were picked to finish dead last in almost every pre-season poll, but quarterback Greg Lilly has put up herculean numbers (89 completions in 137 attempts,1532 yards, 2 touchdowns) while leading Richmond to the upper echelon of the Yankee Conference.

Richmond has climbed to No. 11 in the country in this week's Division 1-AA poll, which has Delaware climbing to No. 7, and Villanova dropping into a tie for eighth with Samford.

While Richmond has the most potent offense in the YanCon, the stingiest defense belongs to none other but the boys from Amherst.

The Minutemen defense has played like a pack of crazed dogs as of late, holding opponents to an average of 275.4 yards in total offense per game.

In last Saturday's 20-7 victory over UConn, the UMass defense had the Huskies' number all day, sacking UConn quarterback's Tom DeSarno and Tony Valente seven times while making the UConn front five resemble a certain offensive line that calls Foxboro home.

UMass outside linebacker Scott Assencoa had the game of his life on Saturday, sacking the UConn duo of QB's five times while batting down two Tom DeSarno passes.

The UMass defense allowed the Huskies only 180 yards of total offense, causing UConn headman Tom Jackson to publicly berate his offensive line after the game.

On the injury front, UMass quarterback Andrew McNeilly suffered a concussion in Saturday's win, but is expected to start against Villanova.

Not so lucky however is UMass fullback Mike George, whose sprained ankle is listed as day-to-day, although George may not start on Saturday but could see some action.

Weekly Yankee Conference Awards: Defensive player of the Week: UMass' Scott Assencoa shares this award with Derek Whitaker of the University of Richmond. Assencoa racked up five sacks against UConn, while Whitaker sacked Boston University quarterback Walter Norton, Jr. four times.

Assencoa, a junior form Natick, now trails Mario Perry for the team lead for sacks by two (7-5), while eclipsing his total of a year ago (2) in one afternoon.

• Rookie of the Week: For the second time this season, this honor goes to UMass' freshman tailback Rene Ingoglia. Ingoglia rushed for 138 yards and one touchdown in Saturday's win over UConn.

Ingoglia has now rushed for over four hundred yards (91-442), and has a realistic shot at cracking the one thousand yard mark.

• Offensive player of the week: Lanue Johnson of Delaware racked up 166 yards in total offense in Saturday's 21-20 thriller over Villanova to take home this week's YanCon offensive player of the week award.

College hoops: The Big East

I am going to continue on with the college basketball previews. This week, I'm going to knock out two conferences, the Big East and the SEC. Here they are:

BIG EAST: This division is wide-open with only Seton Hall really standing out above the crowd. There are a number of different scenarios which could develop this year.

Jeff
CROFTS

Seton Hall is the definitive favorite to win the Big East. The Pirates have excellent guards in Terry Dehere (Mr. Clutch), Danny Hurley , and Bryan Caver . If behemoth (try 7'2" 290 on for size) Luther Wright develops the way he should've last year and helps out fellow widebody, 6'7" forward Jerry Walker than the Pirates will handily rule the conference.

Syracuse, ahh, how Jim Boeheim must look even more aggravated now that the Orangemen are on probation. Despite the sanctions' Boeheim still has a skilled club. Lawrence Moten , who made it look so effortless last year, returns, as does center Conrad "What did I do wrong except cash a couple checks?" Mcrae , and guards Adrian Autry and Mike Hopkins . John Wallace , an impressive freshman banger gives Boeheim room to experiment up front.

Boston College had a strong campaign last year, making it to the NIT. The optimism for Jim O'Briens' squad is sky-high this year. That is because of junior center Bill Curley is as tough as

Burgers, beer, and the NHL

If there's anyone left on this campus who doubts the value of tailgating to home football attendance, let he or she witness the 10,990 fans who climbed the stairs at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium last Saturday for UMass' 20-7 pasting of UConn.

It was great to witness so many people having fun Saturday afternoon. Burgers on the hibachi and cold brew aside, fun could be seen and had just about everywhere, including inside the Stadium. Why didn't this happen until my senior year? Why didn't we bring back tailgating sooner? Why does only the lure of alcohol bring students out for games?

More importantly, why ask why? I'll see you in E Lot Saturday.

Greg
SUKIENNIK

My inside sources tell me Cam Neely may never lace 'em up for the Boston Bruins again. When written pieces on Neely start comparing his fragile knee to Gord Kluzak's, you know something is dreadfully wrong. If Jill Samuelson knows what's good for himself, he'd better stay home the next time Pittsburgh visits the Gah-den. Unless, of course, pain is something he enjoys.

Then again, no brain, no pain.

As for the remaining, healthy Bruins who can skate and shoot and throw left hooks, you've got to be impressed by their quick start. It speaks volumes more that head coach Brian Sutter says he isn't impressed. Imagine how good the B's will be when they reach his standards. Then imagine what May is like in downtown Boston during a Stanley Cup parade.

Ottawa and Tampa Bay surprised everyone by actually winning more games than they lost the first week of the NHL season. At last glance, however, both teams were seen plummeting towards the cellar, where they belong. Hey, feel no pity. They had their fun for the year.

Meanwhile, Buffalo Sabres management got what they wanted. Their threats of moving the Sabres were met with a pledge from city and county officials to build a new home for the team, which hasn't been past the first round of the playoffs since I was in middle school. So much for incentive to perform.

If you or I threatened to leave our jobs, you know what we'd hear? "Don't let the door hit you on the backside on the way out." But if you're a professional sports franchise, even the suggestion of a major city in Florida will get you luxury boxes, sweetheart parking and concessions deals, even a new park to play in.

Yes, sports are a business, but there's something fundamentally wrong with this picture. Ask the residents of Baltimore, St. Louis and Oakland how they feel about being jerked around by owners who

UMass reinstates women's sports teams

By TRUDY TYNAN
Associated Press

AMHERST — Faced with the threat of a lawsuit, the University of Massachusetts agreed Wednesday to reinstate three women's sports teams dropped over the past three years.

"I was really pleased with the University's attitude," said Patricia Flannery, a Boston lawyer representing the women athletes. "They saved their players a lot of heartaches."

Flannery contended the settlement brings the state university into compliance with the federal law requiring schools to provide equal opportunities for men and women athletes.

"We couldn't be happier with the university's reaction," said Pam Levine, captain of the women's tennis team. "The women's teams should never have been dropped.

The students hired Flannery after the school dumped women's tennis this spring even though the players had raised enough in private donations to cover the cost of fielding the team and their coach had offered to work for $1,000.

"That's when we really felt we were not equally treated," said Amy Ryan, a senior tennis player, pointing out that the men's soccer team had been allowed to continue after an alumnus promised to cover its expenses.

Also reinstated beginning spring semester was the women's lacrosse team, cut in 1990 a decade after Massachusetts won the first national women's lacrosse championship sponsored by the NCAA. The women's volleyball team is to resume play in the fall of 1993. Volleyball was dropped in 1991.

The agreement calls for the university to cover the cost of all three of the sports teams at least through the 1995-96 school year.

Over the past three years, the cash-strapped school announced plans to also cut several men's sports to save money, including soccer, water polo and men's tennis. But the only men's team not to be salvaged by either school or private grants was the tennis squad.

"Although women make up 50 percent of the undergraduate enrollment at the university, the cuts left them with 30 percent of the athletic opportunities," said Jeffrey Foote of Portland, Oregon, president of the Trial Lawyers for Public Justice, which also participated in the settlement.

"Umass has taken a potential legal problem and created a solution that will benefit all concerned," said Foote, whose group has been active in pressing equity cases involving women's teams at several universities.

Hooker against tuition hikes as budgetary cure

By ANNE STUART
Associated Press

BOSTON — Colleges and universities can no longer keep charging students more money to make ends meet, the new president of the University of Massachusetts said yesterday.

"The solution of raising tuition and fees has limits to it and we have pretty much achieved those limits," Michael K. Hooker said at a conference on the financial crisis in higher education.

Hooker and others warned that colleges must instead cut costs or face losing students who simply can't afford the bills even at public schools.

"I fear that we may be slipping backward to a day when family wealth determined college choice," said Daniel S. Cheever Jr., president of the Massachusetts Higher Education Assistance Corp.

Cheever, the former president of Boston's Wheelock College, said 37 percent of all students enrolled in the most selective colleges come from families earning more than $100,000 a year, the top 5 percent income bracket.

Meanwhile, Cheever said, states nationwide have decreased funding for higher education. "Here in New England, state appropriations fell almost 7 percent in two years, and in Massachusetts, some public campuses

Question 3 a hot issue

MassPIRG promotes packaging law

By ANGIE POPOVICH and ROMIN THOMSON
Collegian Correspondents

The Massachusetts' Public Interest Research Group is promoting a hotly-contested bill which they feel will ban wasteful packaging.

Question 3, the Recycling Initiative, will force corporations to become more environmentally responsible in their packaging methods. It calls for five ways to reduce wasteful packaging to be phased in over four years.

Sarah Turk, MassPIRG's campus organizer at UMASS, said she sees the initiative as a "ground-breaking law," that will lead to "environmental recycling standards for the country."

MassPIRG faces opposition through a massive lobbying effort led chiefly by several major multinational corporations.

Companies such as DuPont, Exxon and Dow Chemical have spent over four million dollars promoting a controversial advertising campaign which pro-Question 3 advocates claim utilizes false assertions. Those favoring the initiative have found discrepancies throughout the campaign.

Backers are calling for an investigation to be launched in order to determine the validity of these charges. Josh Kratka, an attorney working with supporters of the initiative, said he feels that it is "criminal that the out-of-state plastics and packaging industry is using its unlimited advertising budget to deceive and mislead the voters."

Supporters of the bill claim discrepancies have been found in advertisements stating the bill will result in higher consumer prices, "costly red tape," and the creation of three new state bureaucracies.

"Since the release of the advertisements, the percentage of supporters has dropped from 81 to 52 percent," said Andy MacDonald, the statewide organizing campus director of MassPIRG. "People are only seeing the negative, opposing side, so there is a large doubt in people's minds. We must give individual messages to the public — it is our main priority."

MassPIRG has begun an effort to educate UMass students in the discrepancies they see in the campaign. For example, Turk said "there is a major misconception that the bill will hurt small businesses, but it won't even apply to them."

Olver campaign under the gun

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — U.S. Rep. John Olver's recent campaign blunders prove he will do anything to hold onto his 1st Congressional District seat, his Republican rival Patrick Larkin charged in a debate Wednesday.

Larkin attacked Olver for mistakenly charging that he had a no-show job with a conservative New Jersey congressman at the same time he was chief of staff for the late U.S. Rep. Silvio Conte. An Olver campaign staffer also taped a private conversation between a reporter and a Democratic Leominster city councilman.

Olver "will do anything and say anything to get elected," Larkin said in the debate at the Bershire Hilton.

Olver, who has apologized for both gaffes, responded with a self-deprecating remark.

"Over my lifetime as both a scientist and a public official I have been extremely careful," he said. "In fact usually people say that I look at the research so long that I come into the issue too late to do anything about it."

Olver also said he thinks it is time to get on with the issues, and not to focus on his campaign mistakes.

The Amherst Democrat initially defended his claim that Larkin had two jobs despite Larkin's denials, but issued an apology after a check of social security numbers showed that a different Patrick

D.A. who inspired "JFK" dies

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — Jim Garrison, the flamboyant district attorney whose maverick theories about the assassination of President John F. Kennedy inspired a hit movie, died yesterday. He was 70.

Garrison served 12 years as New Orleans district attorney and 12 years as a judge on the state's 4th Circuit Court of Appeal, from which he stepped down last year when he reached the mandatory retirement age of 70. His death today, at his home in New Orleans, was announced in court by a former colleague, state Appellate Judge Patrick Schott.

Garrison's belief that Kennedy was the victim of a CIA plot and government coverup formed the basis for the nationally publicized trial against Clay Shaw and three books, including "On the Trail of the Assassins" which was the basis of the 1992 movie "JFK."

In the movie, Garrison, ironically, was cast as Earl Warren, chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court and head of the commission that established that the president was slain by a lone assassin, Lee Harvey Oswald.

Directed by Oliver Stone, the movie stars Kevin Costner in the part of Garrison.

It was Garrison's belief that the Warren report was a hastily compiled document

UMass Police Log

Compiled by Michael Day
Recent incidents recorded by the University's Department of Public Safety.

• University police responded to an annoying behavior report in the parking lot of Boyden Gymnasium on Tuesday evening. According to police, a man reportedly was confronted by his former girlfriend at 6:30 p.m., and the woman then created a disturbance. The man told police that he will be seeking a restraining order.

• A man reported damage done to his car on Tuesday after another car apparently struck it and then left the scene, according to police. The man's vehicle was parked in Lot 22 at the time, and police estimate that it sustained $1000 in damages.

• Police received a report of burglary to a man's car in the Campus Center parking garage on Tuesday afternoon. The man reported that his vehicle was broken into and a leather coat, a calculator and sunglasses were stolen. Police estimate the value of the items to be $775.

• A man reported the theft of his leather jacket and other clothing from his room in Brett Residence Hall on Tuesday, according to police. Police received the report at approximately 6:30 p.m., and value the stolen items at $125.

• A stolen license plate was reported to UMass police on Tuesday. A man said that his car was parked in Lot 63 when the plate was stolen. Police value the plate at $45.

Madonna's Sex a real hot item

By LARRY McSHANE
Associated Press

Contents unseen, Madonna fans around the country dug deep into their pockets Wednesday, handing over $49.95 to become the first owners of their undressed idol's fantasies about S&M, bondage and nude pizza eating.

"What will I find? What you always find in Madonna's music or videos or books — sex," said Howard Silvera of New York City, clutching his Mylar-wrapped copy of "Sex."

"In this day and age, she's our Marilyn, our Elvis, our whatever."

Maybe, but you never saw the King posing near-naked with a switchblade pointed at his crotch, or Marilyn hitchhiking in just a pair of high heels. Which may be the whole point, said one buyer in Boston.

"I wanted to see how far she's gone. I want to see if it's all they say," said Marielle Scungio, 28, who turned up at the Barnes & Noble in Boston's Downtown Crossing. The outlet sold about 20 copies in its first two hours of business.

At many stores, the book was kept behind the counter so the curious had no chance to break through its silver Mylar seal and peep inside. Customers had to ask for their "Sex."

Michael Gunczy did just that — five times. The native of Vienna, Austria, paid $270.35 (with tax) to take home five copies. A friend with him ordered eight copies, and lugged two bags out of the B. Dalton's on New York's Fifth Avenue.

"We read that the books will sell out in Europe, so we decided to get them here," said Gunczy. "I think it's a book to collect."

There were no lines in midtown Manhattan, but it appeared Gunczy might be right about Europe. In London, more than 150 rain-soaked people stood in line waiting for bookstores to open at midnight for a special "Sex" sale. In Paris, major bookstores reported the book had sold out.

Politically correct? Or just try to be? All the best radicals read the Collegian.

This Fall, for only the second year, Advocacy Network is listed as an approved agency by COMEC (Commonwealth of Massachusetts Employees Contribution) to receive your contribution as a state employee through COMEC via United Way as the collection agency.

Advocacy Network is an all-volunteer group which advocates for the mentally retarded residing primarily in Western Massachusetts. We have achieved much success as evidenced by our lengthy record of significant accomplishments – including the involvement of the federal and state courts – and we are soon to achieve a historic first: the closing of the Belchertown State School by January 1993.

Through the years, Advocacy Network has been closely involved with thousands of University of Massachusetts students who have participated in the long-standing and successful Boltwood Project, a recognized student organization.

As you prepare your COMEC contribution form, please specify Advocacy Network. None of us is paid. We are dependent upon public contributions.

If you wish to learn more about Advocacy Network, please phone (413) 256-1313 and we will not only answer your questions, but we will mail you our handsome, updated flyer.

Thank you.

Columbus Day renamed

If you thought the University of Massachusetts was the only place where an anti-Columbus Day rally could take place, guess again.

Michigan State University students joined a group of more than 200 indigenous people and marched on the state's Capitol as legislators inside passed a resolution making Columbus Day, Michigan's Aboriginal People's Day, according to The State News.

People in the crowd declared this day the beginning of a new 500 years for indigenous people.

"We will begin today to start a new time in our lives as Native American people in unity, in peace with one another," said Dennis Belindo, director of the Michigan Urban Indian Consortium.

Marchers — dressed in American Indian ribbon shirts, cloth dresses and buckskin — performed a round dance symbolic of their unity and survival during the last 500 years.

Protests were also reported at the University of Arizona and Purdue University.

The Wild Wild (North)West

Students at the University of Washington can apparently do at least two things very well. One is play football — the Huskies are currently the top-ranked team in the nation. The other is act in a somewhat wild manner.

According to The Daily, the student newspaper at Washington, on Sept. 27 the Phi Delta Theta fraternity threw a party which resulted in a brawl allegedly between the fraternity brothers and a group of those very good football players.

The fight, which police described as "chaotic," ended after UW student Jennifer Wen was hit in the eye with a flying bottle. Wen is currently blinded in her right eye, but is improving daily.

Police have had a hard time sorting out the details but University officials have made it clear they are pleased with neither the fraternity nor the football players.

Washington football coach Don James said he is confident the fight is not a team problem but promised to look into the incident.

Further adding to the madness is this odd scene. Apparently, at 1:44 a.m. on Sept. 24, a member of the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity arrived at the front door of the Delta Delta Delta sorority house, disguised as a suitor for one of the women in the house.

The fraternity brother had a bundle of flowers and asked the women answering the door if he could enter and speak with a particular sorority member. When the door was opened, between 10 and 15 other fraternity brothers rushed into the house and began yelling and screaming. The brothers rushed up stairs and what resulted was an old-fashioned, if they ever happened, "panty-raid."

Within minutes sorority sisters report having been verbally assaulted, groped and generally frightened. By the time the police came the fraternity members had climbed down a fire escape to freedom. Kind of reminds me of that scene in "Animal House" when John Belushi has his ladder fall backwards.

Anyway, the police tracked these alleged hooligans down, but it turns out that unless the sorority house wants to press charges there will be no further action. Delta Delta Delta has not yet pressed charges.

Tequila case revisited

Regular readers of "News from other U's" will recall last week's tale of Marie Brinkmeyer, an 18-year old who died from sucking down over 20 shots of Pepe Lopez tequila. A Texas court recently ruled the tequila company responsible for the death and Brinkmeyer's family was awarded $1.5 million.

This space applauds a recent editorial by The Daily Texan condemning the verdict with a touch of humor. The piece was entitled "Tequila case award must be taken with a grain of salt."

Rosenberg, Story call FY1993 budget a good sign for UMass

By MICHELLE ROBBINS

MATT KAHN / COLLEGIAN
State Senator Stanley Rosenberg

Two local legislators told the Undergraduate Student Senate last night there was reason for optimism at the University of Massachusetts because of an 8 percent increase in the University's budget for the 1993 fiscal year.

"Things are looking up. We have turned the corner and are back on the road to recovery from the previous four years of budget cuts," said state Sen. Stanley Rosenberg.

Rosenberg said there was an overall increase of $70 million for the five University of Massachusetts campuses. He said the Amherst campus received $11 million.

"This increase is more than twice the rate of inflation, but the University still has a long way to go considering that about $30-39 million has been cut from the budget in previous years," said Rosenberg.

Rosenberg said the library's budget was increased from $2.4 million to $10 million this year. "This is a tripling of the library's allocations," he said.

State Rep. Ellen Story of Amherst said she gave some credit to the students and parents for the increase in the budget. "The lobbying at the State House really had an impact on the legislature," she said.

"Tell your friends, neighbors and family to write to their state representative and let them know the University needs more money," said Story. She said if a representative receives three to five letters on an issue, it has a major impact.

Rosenberg said the University's Board of Trustees wanted full tuition retention, but the state and community colleges were opposed to the idea. Tuition retention means the University keeps all the tuition money it receives and state funding decreases by a corresponding amount.

Rosenberg proposed a policy regulating tuition retention, which would provide a formula allowing the state to arrive at an amount to allocate to public higher education.

"Then the state should figure out what fair share to ask of the students and lock it into law so the University can't tinker with it," Rosenberg said.

Addressing the issue of racial tension on campus, Rosenberg said as soon as students develop specific proposals about the issues, he will work to get the proposals through the legislature to obtain the money and changes students want.

"Story and I didn't want to politicize the race issue and thereby create unreasonable problems," said Rosenberg. "I want the students to know we stand ready to participate, but want the students to work on the issue themselves."

Story said she believes University President Michael K. Hooker has a strong commitment to initiating changes on campus which will effect minority students. "I believe Hooker is going in the right direction, and if I didn't I might have acted differently on the race issue," she said.

At the outset of the meeting, the Senate elected Mike Poster as speaker of the senate and Emily Rose as treasurer.

MassPIRG aids homeless with 'Trick or Treat'

The Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group is conducting a "Trick or Treat" at local apartment complexes on Halloween night to collect canned food to assist local homeless shelters and food pantries.

MassPIRG's Halloween project is part of a series of events the group has organized or participated in focusing on the double problems of hunger and homelessness.

• Since early October, volunteers at MassPIRG have been compiling statistics and data concerning hunger and homelessness in the Amherst area. According to MassPIRG volunteers, there are over 5,000 homeless people in the Amherst area, including 1,616 families.

Since July of 1991 the Amherst Survival Center has donated more than 1,200 boxes of food to Amherst and surrounding towns and has served over 5,000 meals. The Center has also donated almost 160,5000 pounds of clothes.

• MassPIRG has also participated in the National Conference on Hunger and Homelessness by sending two students from UMass. The conference included workshops and speakers aimed at educating people about hunger and homelessness in the United States and throughout the world.

• MassPIRG volunteers have also been visiting the five residential areas on campus collecting canned foods on a weekly basis as part of a semester-long project.

• MassPIRG has been running campaigns concerning various environmental issues, including the "Green Bill Campaign," which is focused on gathering support to pass questions Three and Four on the ballot. If passed, Question Three would require manufacturers to reduce, reuse or recycle the materials they use in packaging by 1996.

Question Four would write into law a fifth of a penny tax on every pound of toxic chemicals used by companies

Public Safety hires five new police officers

By DAVE MASSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Division of Public Safety has hired five new police officers, including one woman and two minorities.

Public Safety now boasts five women police officers and five minority officers, out of a total of 35 uniformed police officers.

This appointment, officials say, fills existing empty spots in the department and is unrelated to Chancellor Richard O'Brien's plan to hire 20 new security personnel as a response to the recent rash of racial incidents on campus.

In a few weeks, the five new officers will begin a 17-week intensive program at the Municipal Police Officers Academy in Agawam. The officers will receive "in-depth training" on civil rights, human relations, criminal law, motor vehicle law, police ethics, defensive tactics, firearms, police liability and report writing.

"We personally visited 30 college and university campuses in Massachusetts, seeking female and minority applicants," said Jack Luippold, director of Public Safety. "We also advertised extensively in minority publications across New England and the nation."

Before beginning their new shifts, the new officers will complete a three-month field training officer program which includes diversity education.

Preparing for future vacancies, Luippold said he began developing a list of applicants for the positions in December 1991. In fact, Luippold said over 500

Recycled speeches, tired lines a poor excuse for debate

"Okay," I told myself a while back, "wait until the debates are over, then decide who gets your vote for President."

Hmm. Two weeks later, I'm a little less confused about what George Bush, Ross Perot and Bubba Clinton are all about. That's rather unfortunate, because by and large I don't like what I see.

Rather, I don't like what they've decided to show me.

Greg
SUKIENNIK

If you listened carefully to what Bush, Clinton and Perot had to say, you may have found yourself saying "Gee, that's awfully familiar." And well you should, because it's the same damn thing over and over and over. These weren't debates, these were regurgitations of convention speeches, sound bites and commercials we've been watching since February. How pathetic.

Take Clinton, for example. I still want to like Bubba. I'll probably vote for him anyway. But while he has answered questions directly, more often than not he's quoted himself verbatim from his July acceptance speech. His answers on health care and restarting the economy are good examples. How many times have you heard the phrase starting with "100 prominent economists?" As if 100 economists could agree on the color of the sky.

Clinton isn't alone on the spit-up circuit. How many times has Bush said "... we're going to have a new Congress next year?" Wrong again, George. The chances of incumbents losing elections, even this year, are slim and none. Even John Olver, who hasn't done much to warrant either his re-election or his dismissal, is still a better-than-average shot to win this fall. At least he was until his staffers started eavesdropping.

I get the uncontrollable urge to strangle Ross Perot every time he says "and I'm doing this for you, the American people." Really, Ross. I didn't doubt your sincerity until the 12th time I heard it. Then I got suspicious.

Speaking of Perot, here's complaint number two about the debates: will someone, anyone, please answer a question?

Perot was the worst offender on this count. When asked for specifics on difficult questions such as, "What would you do to ease racial tensions?" or, "How will you bridge the gap between parties on Capitol Hill?" Perot went flying off on some vague, campaign rhetoric tangent about the American Dream and how he is the man to bring it back to us.

What about Perot's specific plans? I'll give him this: Perot is the only candidate who has come forth with a deficit reduction plan that doesn't rely on smoke and mirrors. While Clinton talks about economic investment with Monopoly money? Credit cards?) and Bush offers the same tripe about cutting spending, Perot has come up with a real plan. It'll cripple the economy and send the price of gasoline through the exosphere, but hey, it's a plan.

When it came to other issues, however, Perot cops out. He's fond of saying "there's a lot of plans, good plans, that have been floating around Washington for years but have never been tried." Wow. I never would have guessed. Which plans, Ross?

Future debate moderators should be equipped with small buttons on their desks. Buttons which, when pressed, send an electric shock similar to that of a stun gun coursing through the nervous system of any candidate who eludes answering any question directly. The last candidate left alive wins.

I think I'll vote for Clinton, because I feel compelled to vote. But next time around there had better be some changes. This wasn't a campaign, this is pro wrestling. Imagine Bush and Clinton are Ric Flair (D-Arkansas) and "Macho Man" Randy Savage (R-Texas) the next time you see debate highlights. The comparison isn't so far-fetched. When the future of our nation resembles quasi-sports entertainment, you know there's problems. Big problems.

So if this is pro wrestling, is the election fixed?

Greg Sukiennik never watches the WWF, but thought Perot should have been disqualified as third man in the ring.

Meeting for future of Cultural Center

Dear fellow student,

You are invited to participate in a community meeting to discuss the future of the Latin American Cultural Center. The meeting is scheduled for Thursday, Oct. 22 at 7 p.m. in the SBA Rm. 116.

The Latin American Cultural Center was closed during the fall semester in 1991, in unity with the administrative mistreatment of the Cultural Centers and the ignored demands both centers submitted to the Division of Academic Support Services and the administration in Whitmore.

The following points will be discussed in the general meeting:

- History behind the closure of the center.
- Under what conditions may the center be opened.
- Depending on the decision made in this meeting an action plan will be drafted on what we should do about the Cultural Center.

Your participation in this meeting is essential to determine the future of our Cultural Center. We hope to see you at this meeting and don't forget that ". . . en la union esta la fuerza," y como dijo Ruben Blades SE PUEDE!

Students concerned about the future of the Latin American Cultural Center

Dean asks the faculty: what else can you do?

Dear Colleagues:

I attended Oklahoma A & M College in the mid-forties as an undergraduate. Most of the students in my classes were White, although a few were Native American. In one class there was a screen in a corner which separated one student from the rest of us. The student who sat behind the screen was Black!

In those days, Black students in Oklahoma had to attend Black colleges unless the program that they needed only was offered at one of the non-Black schools. When they attended a class in a non-Black school, they were screened from the other students in that class. Imagine the isolation and fear that those Black students experienced.

That was about half a century ago, yet today many of our students of color have similar feelings of isolation and fear on this predominantly White campus. Skin color is not a salient determinant of our sense of well-being so long as those around us share the same color. Skin color becomes a determinant of our sense of well-being when we are surrounded by people whose skin color differs from ours. For those of us who are White, just imagine the strong feelings of isolation and fear you would experience when walking by yourself in one of the Black neighborhoods in any major city in the United States. This is part of the experience of our students of color that is reinforced by acts of verbal, pictorial and physical violence on campus.

The screen was a physical manifestation of racism. The screen is gone, but not the prejudice. The screen is gone, but not the feelings of isolation and fear.

When I attended Cornell University in the mid-fifties as a graduate student, my classes were composed of male and female students. In those days, Cornell was the only Ivy League school that admitted women to graduate work. The women students were as good (if not better) than the men. When it came time for my graduating class to search for faculty positions, only men were offered positions at major research universities. To be sure, even in those days, some women were hired by these institutions, but just imagine what their sense of isolation and well-being was like. Just ask the women in your department how they feel today!

In this country you have reason to be concerned about your well-being if you are a person of color or a female. Unfortunately, the same concerns are present on our college campuses. It is difficult for any one of us to rid the country of the plague of prejudice, but each of us can take action to rectify the situation on our campus. I ask each of you to take responsibility and help eliminate racial and gender discrimination on this campus. Talk to your students, your staff and your colleagues about steps that might be taken in your department to make the campus a safer and more productive place for people of color and for females. Then ask yourself what else YOU can do!

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

Ya know, either people are deliberately dropping road-kills in front of me on the road or we've got to start driving more carefully.

Readers will notice that "Graffiti O' the Week" hasn't appeared in Notes from the Campus Center Basement for a couple of weeks now. Hopefully certain individuals on this campus will take the hint.

Employees working on the second floor of Memorial Hall get Marc's Golden Burrito Award this week. I give out these things every now and then when I see someone do something so outrageously logical that I jump up and yell, "Weeee!"

These 30 or so University employees got displaced from their offices a couple of weeks ago when a few students, non-students, graduate students — whatever, it's all a blur at this point — were overcome with another bout of western Massachusetts' famous Takeover Virus. Apparently, they decided the second floor of Memorial Hall was small enough for their incredibly shrinking protest to defend so they went in for about a week to demand free pizza, press coverage, a new public address system, some of Gov. Weld's stationery, and 40 scholarships for low-income women of color. I'll skip all of the mistakes these protest vets shouldn't have made (like forgetting the food and assuming Domino's would deliver for free) and get right down to those fabulous University staffers, who, ironically, are in charge of raising scholarship money and said they agreed with much of what the protesting pundits were talking about.

Marc
ELLIOTT

Well after a week, these state employees really wanted to get back to work. The fact that state employees wanted to get back to work is in itself worth a Golden Burrito. So, one morning they went in and asked the occupiers to move downstairs to the lounge so they could do their jobs. Of course they refused to budge and the employees moved their stuff downstairs for them. Whoa.

While I'm on the subject of Memorial Hall, I've got to compliment the Graduate Voice's staff on their dedication. There aren't many journalists who are willing to take over a floor of a building to hold a week-long staff meeting. The Collegian hardly ever has meetings for the whole staff at a time. Wow. Can you separate the reporters from the protesters? Ick.

While I'm on the subject of protests and takeovers, I promised last time I did Notes to mention a few administrators in my next Notes column. How many out out there knew that our new — and highly paid — University president, Michael K. Hooker, took over a building when he went to college in North Carolina? The way he tells it, he was a student worker in Chapel Hill's dining commons and making less than minimum wage. The law there allowed it for some food service employees on the assumption they would make up the rest in tips. Anyone who's been to the D.C. knows tips just don't happen there. So he and a bunch of angry food scoopers took over a law school building that wasn't being used at the time and set up an alternative cafeteria effectively shutting down the other one. They said they wouldn't come out until the chancellor recognized the union and he did. 'Course the next semester the school hired an outside contractor to run the dining commons and all the student employees were fired. Eh.

I noticed the chancellor said he would refuse to talk with the students in Memorial Hall because they were engaged in an illegal occupation of a building. Hmmmm. I wonder where I've heard that before? I wonder where I wish I'd heard that before.

Pop quiz: What UMass housing director had his picture in local papers last semester holding a toy gun to his head? Here's a clue:
he was trying to illustrate that using condoms, which he said are sometimes defective, is like playing Russian roulette.

Everybody's mom loves Angela Lansbury.

Eh.

Confront issues with education

I never thought I would have to confront anti-Semitism here at UMass. Unfortunately, I have encountered it three times this semester.

A huge banner with the names and a little background of everyone on my floor hung near my door. Someone decided to scrawl the words "Hebe" by my name. I was shocked. I couldn't believe that this was really happening. Why did some ignorant fool write this? Was it written because I speak fluent Hebrew, and that the term "Hebe" was a nickname for me? I didn't like it and before I could cross it out someone else (a friend of my R.A.) had already taken the liberty of crossing it out and writing underneath it, "That's anti-Semitism."

Adam Scott
ROBERTS

Then someone in one of my classes asked me if I was Jewish after I gave a speech in debate class. I answered, "Why do you ask?" Her response: "Because, you look like a Jew-boy." Now, her tone wasn't threatening but her statement was. I responded politely, "What does a Jew-boy look like?" Her final answer was, "You. Because you're cute and you're rich. . ." Hello, this is anti-Semitism. It's repugnant. It's uncalled for. And it is wrong!

These incidents bothered me and I never spoke out about how I felt until I spoke with the rabbi at Hillel. He advised me to speak with the person who made these remarks to me. I thought about it and didn't get a chance to say something to her. However, before I got a chance to confront her I heard another horrifying statement from the same person: "Be nice now, or I'll have Uncle Adolph come pay you a visit." Stop and think for a minute. This is anti-Semitism without a doubt.

This time I took the rabbi's advice and approached her. I explained to her that whether she meant them or not, that it was wrong. She responded, "It's not anti-Semitism. It really depends on who is saying it." Wrong again! I explained that it doesn't matter who says it; it's still anti-Semitism. She agreed and was glad that I approached her on how I felt.

I realized through reasoning and explanations I was able to confront an upsetting issue with education. I explained to her that day, "How do you think someone feels when they hear these remarks, especially to a person that has lost relatives to the Holocaust?" This woman understood my point that her statements were made in a subtle manner, and that they are the major premise that anti-Semitism is founded on.

In the light of all that has transpired here at UMass over the last few weeks, there is a strong feeling of tension. I know that I wasn't the first victim — there have been many unreported (surprise! surprise!) incidents on campus and we must all speak up and let our voices be heard. Hate crimes are a fact of life and by educating people about anti-Semitism we can only hope to change things and that is a goal that not only Jewish people have to fight for, but all minority groups as a whole.

Where's glory in the new world order?

"Our cause is just!" — Norman Schwartzkopf

In every debate I have watched, neither Bush nor Quayle have failed to expound upon "Our Nation's" glorious victory for freedom and democracy in the Middle East. And in every debate, neither Gore nor Clinton have voiced anything but praise for the president's handling of the situation. It really disappoints me that an articulate intellectual such as Clinton would betray his ideals in order to appease the patriotic masses, but I cannot say I am surprised.

Nathan
CRICK

The politics of war have shaped our world since the beginning of human history, and is not soon to be abandoned. To be able to create an enemy with a demon's visage and make killers out of children is an art that has been inherited by every government, and a religion that we have been baptized in from the day we learned "Cowboys and Indians." It makes no difference whether it is the Soviet Union, Vietnam or Iraq; there is always a space in our subconscious eagerly awaiting the creation of a Godless nation that will cry out for our deadly and righteous intervention.

The war against Iraq was a battle of good versus evil, at least in our minds. It wouldn't have mattered if Kuwait was Sodom and Gomorrah, if the government wanted us to be outraged with Iraq it could've made us outraged with Iraq. It wouldn't matter if a year later we all found out we were lied to, because the public is always ready to forgive and forget and be led like lemmings when the next cliff comes along.

We are so willing to forgive because we do not believe that our nation will put our people behind a gun for power or politics. We always go to war for an ideal. "Hey, there's some Naked Aggression! It's about time we take a stand against that!" America cannot be corrupt because we always fight with our lofty morality behind our guns. To protest the war would be to condone Naked Aggression, and in the Iraq scenario the government created those nifty little ribbons so if you protested the war you obviously did not care for the safety of our troops either. Never mind that it was George Bush who send them to fight in the desert; if any of them were killed it was because YOU dared to protest.

The thing that really scares me, though, is not our childlike mentality of warfare. What is really frightening is the lack of remorse we have for those we killed, as if we were still following the defense that, "They needed to die." How can we praise God for our victory when after we zipped up our pants and left, most of the Iraqi people were abandoned to drink out of puddles in the road and die quietly from the diseases it gave them? Because they are subhuman, that's why. Because we believe that the herdsmen who live in the desert are simply incarnates of Saddam, and if we mistakenly drop napalm on them they damn well deserved it.

It's one of the great brainwashing techniques in human history, that one's government is the country. Bush might call on me to bomb Iraqis, and now suddenly I'm serving my country and helping to defeat Saddam. Tell me if I'm wrong, but it would seem to me all I'd be doing would be killing frightened human beings so we could give oil back to wealthy monarchs.

I saw a car a couple months ago with the bumper sticker, "Nuke Iraq," with little mushroom clouds all over it. People like that are really sad, when the only way to feel good about themselves is to beat the crap out of someone. What's even more sad is that this nation felt the same way for about a year, and some of us still do. It is embarrassing to witness how ignorant we can all be, and is really pitiful to see our president still clinging to that ignorance even in desperation. I think when he finally bows out, it will be will a solemn moment to reflect upon the New World Order he has created.

For there is no glory in death, George. Even in yours.

Faculty urges president to implement change

Dear President Hooker,

The recent racial incidents on the Amherst campus have once again highlighted the failure of the university policies to insure a quality accessible education for students of all ethnic, cultural and economic backgrounds. The university policies do not even create an atmosphere where students may take for granted their physical safety on campus. This is intolerable. The history of slow, weak and defensive responses to racial incidents on this campus must stop, by taking strong positive actions now to change fundamental policies and conditions.

We strongly support efforts to increase minority representation on campus at all levels, most definitely including the higher administration. Fellowships for minority students from low income backgrounds and a strong commitment to Upward Bound are also important. Implementing new policies within the residence halls is obviously needed as well. It is quite apparent that resident assistants should not be asked to police students who are essentially their peers. An emphasis on the importance of respecting all students' rights should begin the day a student first has contact with the University, at the very least in promotional materials and informational brochures. We also suggest making available a diversity awareness program for incoming students. Staff at this university, in particular those charged with security, need training to deal quickly, sensitively and fairly with the safety concerns and human rights of students from all backgrounds. The problem must be addressed at every level.

We applaud your willingness to recognize the severity of the problem and the failure of past efforts to deal with it. Your statements in the press have lacked the ambivalence and defensiveness of those to which we have become accustomed in the numerous racial incidents on this campus in the past. We strongly urge you to continue to speak out and to assure the implementation of much needed changes influencing the racial climate on this campus. And we offer our cooperation and support in carrying our programs like those mentioned above.

Perot and his ego-driven agenda

If there's a sucker born every minute, then a lot of them are Perot supporters. P.T. Barnum would have been proud.

Perot's current bid for the presidency is the biggest hoax since the Hitler diaries. Ever since the loyalty of "volunteers" gave him an excuse to jump back into the race, it has become abundantly clear that Perot is no longer interested in becoming president, and that he has no intention of winning, or even trying to win, this election.

Perot thought it might be fun to be King of the Hill, and voter dissatisfaction put him on the ballots. It looked like he actually had a chance for a while, but then the press stopped being nice. They weren't obsequious enough and some even had beards. So Perot decided to quit, letting down millions of people who put their misguided trust in him.

The press rightfully savaged him for this shameless display of thoughtless self-indulgence, for once aiming their guns at someone other than a Republican. This was unnacceptable to Perot — he wasn't going down in history as a quitter, a rash fortune-seeker. It was the ever-loving "volunteers" who provided him with another "in." This time the goal was not the White House, but something far more important — a restoration of his shattered reputation.

Perot is an intelligent man, most billionaires are; and his efforts with the POWs in Vietnam were laudable. Perhaps this assessment is too simplistic. He wouldn't really go to all this trouble just to remove the stigma of having abandoned his people on a whim, would he? All doubt was eliminated when Vice-Admiral Stickdale stepped up to the podium at last week's veep debate.

The press has been kind to Stockdale (if he had been a Republican, they would have driven him to suicide with their lauughter). Evidently, there is some kind of sympathy thing at work here: a man like Stockdale is so tough that if seven years of torture in Hanoi didn't destroy him, a few bad press clippings wouldn't exactly bring tears to his eyes.

It is an understatement to say Stockdale was unprepared for this debate. He hadn't been well-briefed on any of the issues with the exception of Perot's perennial favorite, the deficit. Asked a question about health care, Stockdale simply "passed." You do not "pass" in a vice presidential debate. Asked about something else, Stockdale began to ramble incoherently about life in the Navy, mumbling about some naval acronym and emergency battle plans until he forgot what the question was .

A great military man and war hero to be sure, but that alone does no qualify him to be the man "a heartbeat away from the the presidency." The point is that Perot, if his bid for the Wite House was genuine, would have chosen someone sharp as a tack on the issues, a pro. A woman or minority candidate would have convinced a lot of people that Perot was in this for reasons other than his own ego-driven agenda. But by choosing his pal the admiral, by refusing to campaign vigorously across the country like his opponents and by flagrantly dodging issues that do not interest him, Perot has demonstrated that he has no intention of winning this race.

Violence can turn sex into rape

Two women from the Everywoman's Center came in to my psychology lecture to talk about rape. One issue that emerged was about whether or not going back to another person's room implies that you want to have sex with them.

But this argument ignores the fact that even if someone does want to have sex, it is still very possible for them to be raped. To anyone for whom this is incomprehensible, I suggest the following experiment:

Wait until you are good and hungry. Then sit down to eat with two of your strongest friends. Announce to them, "Wow, am I hungry. I really want to eat." Then have them jump up and, using as much force as it takes to pin you down while you resist with all your strength, have them start cramming food into your mouth. Make sure they cram it in faster than you can swallow; make sure they hurt you; make sure you can barely breathe; make sure you don't like the food they use; and most of all, make sure they don't stop, even if you beg them to, until they feel like it (at least 10 minutes).

The point, obviously, isn't that force-feeding is as bad as rape; the point is that even if you want to do something, having it forced on you in a violent way with absolutely no regard for your feelings, is terrifying, agonizing and dehumanizing.

I think anyone can comprehend this. I wish no one had to actually experience it.

Man of Steel's coming demise inspires allegorical interpretation

With the hand of death drawing near for DC Comics' "Superman," one may anticipate a gasp from a lump in the earth called Nietzsche and bepuzzlement for Zarathustra disciples.

An allegorical interpretation of Superman's fate would have "Doomsday" as STD/Racial Tension/Cholesterol/The Concrete Manifestation of the Federal Deficit. And informed readers who have monitored slipshod Superman's waning ability to eschew these diseases of mortality for the past six years have foretold the debacle, leaving only "when" questionable. And if Superman is reborn, due to his role in the business, as his bruited nail-splitting more human (rationalizes "more interesting") counterself, yet another mundane version of you, me and the dreadful common-herder, then he's better un-reborn. And we weep with you, Nietzsche, crying, "Where is our anti-human?" Lamentably, we shall watch our myth, our point of contrast to explore contemporary chaos, die. We, our times, have killed him.

Fabrications being necessity-born, we ponder the results of Superman's death on that willed November 15: poetic entropy? A mere super-speck in an eternally recurring cycle? A displacement in the gargantuan turtles reminiscing the Italian masters? God is dead. Soon Superman will be dead. And hence an era. An oft-consoling concept, the reality of the transitory. . .

Prof. says witch hunts show current attitudes

University of Massachusetts German professor Sigrid Brauner may look more like a thirtysomething baby boomer than a contemporary version of the Antichrist, but that doesn't stop people from sometimes confusing her with a witch.

"I guess you have to expect that making witches your specialty," Brauner says. "And yet, to be honest, it's a little disturbing."

Disturbing indeed, considering the strange historical coincidences in the air. For in this tricentennial year of the Salem witch hunts, a year in which "family values" politicians attack single mothers and working women, history seems to be repeating itself.

That, in part, is why Brauner has begun teaching a new course in the University's German department titled "Witches: Myth and Reality." In the course, Brauner looks at the history of witch hunts in German-speaking Europe and colonial New England.

She examines them in light of our contemporary attitudes towards women and families, and shows how sexual — as well as racial and class differences — still play a role in our imagination of the demonic.

"The first massive witch persecutions clearly followed the events of the Reformation," Brauner said. "The Protestants really stressed that the partriarchal, Old Testament family was the most important social and religous institution. In fact, Luther literally defined witches as women who refused to be obedient housewives."

In her class, Brauner uses a wide array of sources — including contemporary studies in anthropology, theological treatises from the early modern period and witch trial records — to illustrate her points.

Over 90 percent of all witch hunt victims were female, she says, and their moral reputation was the focal point of their persecution.

Indeed, she makes clear that it was their relationship to husband and child that largely sealed their fate.

Of the 150,000 women who were executed in the European and American witch hunts between 1430 and 1750, the vast majority were single or widowed and so suspect in the eyes of those who worshipped the family.

"Surviving interrogation records reveal that the questions put to these women largely concerned their marital relations, their extra-marital sexual behavior, the extent of their religious education and how they were raised and how they raised their children," Brauner said.

At least in Europe, the changing notions of economic hierarchy were related to the persecution of women. Before the witch hunts, large numbers of European women had been trained professionals such as artisans and physicians. With the breakdown of the old guild system, these women began to be excluded from professional life and so denied well-paid jobs.

"Recent statistics show a drastic increase in domestic violence against women," says Brauner. "Indeed, women who try to break out of battering situations by leaving their men and trying to support themselves are often murdered. It could be said that this is the modern equivalent to the violence wrought against women during the witch trials."

Brauner draws a further comparison between the past and present when she looks at the modern political landscape.

"It was not popular attitudes or superstitions that brought women to the stake during the witch hunts, but institutionalized oppression fostered by society's leaders," says Brauner.

"To see how this is the same today, look at Vice President Quayle's attacks on Murphy Brown, the Republicans' bashing of Hillary Clinton, the Senate's hostility to Anita Hill."

In addition to anti-female attitudes, Brauner points out that anti-race and class attitudes were part of the witch trials in America. In Peru, enslaved indigenous people were often singled out as witches, just as in Salem one of the first people accused of witchcraft was a woman of color from the Caribbean.

Brauner says, "Ultimately, it becomes clear that the practice of magic had very little to do with the witch trials at all."

endured budget cuts over 30 percent before rising somewhat this year," he said.

"There is little likelihood we can look to the federal government for a bail-out because, unfortunately, our crisis has come after the savings-and-loan crisis," he told about 200 people, mostly New England college presidents, officials and trustees.

U.S. Rep. Jack Reed, D-R.I., said a higher education bill signed into law this year increases both loans and grants for college students, particularly those from middle-income families.

Hooker, who came to UMass in September, said he had to cut budgets significantly in his previous positions as president of the University of Maryland-Baltimore County and Bennington College in Vermont.

In Maryland, as at UMass and other schools, administrators initially achieved quick savings by deferring maintenance, renovations and purchases of equipment and library materials; cutting part-time faculty positions; increasing class sizes and improving efficiency, he said.

But at many schools, that hasn't been enough.

He advised administrators to work closely with faculty in reducing, eliminating or combining programs. "Any effort to cut costs on campus has to be an effort that achieves consensus before it can go forward successfully," he said.

William M. Chace, president of Wesleyan University, agreed, adding that administrators should disclose all budget information except for individual salaries. "If the process is to work, there can be no secrets," Chace said.

J. Larkin, who writes thrillers and lives in California, worked for former U.S. Rep. James Courtier.

Leominster Councilman Kevin Cormier said his support for Larkin was strengthened after the Olver staffer taped his private converstation. The Olver campaign said the campaign staffer was overly aggressive.

The two candidates also clashed on health care policy during the debate. Olver supports the creation of a national health care system, because he believes it will bring down costs.

Larkin disagrees, and points to malpractice lawsuits as the reason health care costs keep rising.

"I don't believe the federal government can be efficient in controlling cost," Larkin said. "The Medicaid and the Medicare programs have doubled in costs over the last five years and I don't see any improvement in the services that they provide," Larkin said.

Olver was elected last June in the race to fill the seat vacated by Conte's death. Olver beat former Republican gubnatorial candidate Steven Pierce in a hard-fought race.

issued for the good of the country to quell unrest that might lead to war.

But critics, familiar with Garrison's flamboyant early career, said he pursued the Kennedy investigation just to get publicity.

In 1962, Garrison was an upset winner as a reform candidate for district attorney, the first local politician to make effective use of television. Once elected, his raids on French Quarter vice dens and gambling joints were frequently accompanied by an entourage of cameras, lights, technicians and reporters.

His hypnotic stare, air of poised confidence and rumbling expressive voice made him a natural for the medium.

He developed a deep affection for Kennedy as a person and as a symbol. In an interview after publication of his third book, Garrison said of Kennedy: "He had ideals. He inspired dreams."

A series of coincidences led Garrison to believe in a CIA plot, and in 1969 he prosecuted businessman Clay Shaw for conspiring to kill the president.

The 34-day trial was an internationally publicized circus. One key witness died under mysterious circumstances. Other refused to say on the stand what they had told Garrison's investigators. One witness, a psychologist, destroyed his credibility by testifying that he regularly fingerprinted his daughter to make sure a spy had not taken her place.

The jury took less than an hour to acquit Shaw.

But Garrison won re-election to a third term in a landslide.

In 1973, he was charged by federal prosecutors with taking bribes to protect illegal pinball gambling interests. He conducted his own defense and was acquitted, but the trial left him only a month to campaign for a fourth term, and he was defeated by Harry Connick.

"Our goal is to inform as many people before election day as possible. By distributing leaflets and covering the polls, we'll be able to reach the entire voting population," McInerney said.

While both proponents and opponents to the bill continue to spend considerable time and money dealing with it's passage, there are still some who feel the effort is wasteful.

Associate professor of food science Parvinee Chinachoti said she believes the bill will only help to control the wasting of packaging material makes up 30 percent of the waste currently overflowing the state's landfills.

Chinachoti asserts that the state should be focus its attention on the remaining 70 percent of landfill ingredients, of which only eight percent is currently recycled.

Men's crew in swing

Rowers seek consistent performance

By ERIC STEINHILBER
Collegian Corespondent

The University of Massachusetts men's varsity crew team finished near the middle of the pack in last Sunday's Head of the Charles Regatta, according to coach Greg Siemankowski.

So far this fall the UMass men's team fared well in their matches this Fall including an eighth place finish in the Head of Connecticut. Siemankowski said "We've raced successfully against teams we gauge ourselves against, particularily the Coast Guard Academy. So far, in two races we've beaten them once and they've beaten us once. Typically, Coast Guard finishes among the top six schools in the country".

This fall, Siemankowski is stressing fitness and technique. "Rowing is not a simple discipline — you can't learn it all in one year," said Siemankowski. "We're taking the fall to improve general fitness level, a lot of lifting, a lot of running, a lot of long distance rowing that will translate into speed when the spring comes around".

"One of our biggest strong points this year are the numbers, we probably have one of the biggest crews that UMass has had in quite some time," said Siemankowski. "There are about 30 varsity men at this point, novice men are upwards of about 50 or 60 and the women are even larger."

With the fall season winding down, the crew team is looking ahead to their upcoming Regatta in Philadelphia and another competition on the Charles against Harvard, MIT, BU, BC and other local area schools.

In the past UMass has had strong showings at the National Division Two Championships (Dadvail) and the New England Championships. Last year, UMass won the Division Two B Championship convincingly. This year they have returned to Division Two A and Siemankowski appears optimistic and ready for the challenge. "This year we hope to finish in the top six in the A Division which I think is very realistic".

Freshmen phenoms lead soccer to victory

Three results from the University of Massachusetts 2-0 victory over Rhode Island yesterday.

One, the Minutewomen (12-2) put an end to their two game losing streak just in time for Saturday's big match up with Connecticut.

Secondly, Massachusetts Coach Jim Rudy will once again be a clean shaven man. Rudy had previously vowed to not shave until UMass won again. While one admirer reportedly told Rudy he looked "handsome" with the facial growth, most found the clean shaven coach more appealing.

Finally, five UMass freshman made it known that they can all play at the Division 1 level.

Minus starters Kim Eynard, Polly Hackathorn and Lisa Mickelson, Rudy was forced to look to the class of 1996 to fill in. What he received was the usually strong performances of Nicole Roberts and Courtney Smith and big efforts from first time starters Rachel LeDuc, Savia Baron and Nicki Ahrenholz.

"Freshman played well today, they proved the are capable of stepping in," Rudy said. "Savia and Nicky were very good and they hadn't played much this year. By the end of the game they had settled down and were creating the play."

Massachusetts, ranked No. 11 nationally, dominated the Rams throughout. The Minutewomen had 16 shots to URI's 1 and outcornered the Rams 15-0.

One of the corners resulted in a patented Holly Hellmuth goal. In the 22nd minute Paula Wilkins served up the corner and Hellmuth drove to the net, outleapt the defense and headed in her fifth goal of the season.

In the second half, Massachusetts' Carrie Koeper slide tackled a URI player near midfield, gained possession of the ball and served it up to LeDuc.

LeDuc went in one on one with Ram goal keeper Jennifer Ernst and scored into the left corner.

"Koeper won a great tackle at mid field and then sent a nice ball through for Rachel," Rudy said. "It was a great play, LeDuc made no mistakes when she was in alone."

Skye Eddy recorded her fifth shutout of the season improving her record to 6-1 and lowering her goals against average to 0.42.

"It's nice to get back on the winning track," Rudy said. "This was a good game and now we've got two days to prepare for UConn. We'll know if we're ready for them when we get there."

move I can recall where the Red Sox displayed great vision.

• How many times will this year's Boston College team be compared with Doug Flutie's Cotton Bowl team?

• Any ding-dongs who complain about a Canadian team in the World Series need only to repeat the following, "It's the WORLD Series, not the United States Series."

• When Coach Mac stepped into the Hotel Patriots last year it was assumed he would never check out. Now there's so much instability it's hard to say what will happen. Look what Mike Hodges has done here — maybe he can do the same out on Route One.

men defense, providing keeper Mark Wolf with his third shutout.

"Kylish was a key player on the team in terms of their defense. They wouldn't let us get into the goal mouth and that was the difference," said Marrone.

Doyle wore the number 15 jersey of Shawn Bleau, and he credited his play to the inspiration of the co-captain.

"Wearing the jersey gave me a lot of inspiration I can't even put into words," said Doyle.

"The Massachusetts team always comes to play. They are an aggressive and hard working team, and you have to credit the coaches for that," said Marrone.

Highly touted Camby commits

Calipari nabs "big-time" recruit from Connecticut

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Since he arrived in Amherst, University of Massachusetts basketball coach John Calipari has been searching for a true center to play for his team.

Calipari may finally have found his man, in the form of 6-foot-10 Marcus Camby, a product of Hartford Public High School, who verbally committed to UMass yesterday.

"UMass is the best opportunity for me," Camby said. "It is where I felt most comfortable and I got along well with the coaching staff and the players."

Camby will sign a national letter of intent to UMass during the early signing period (Nov. 11-18). Due to NCAA rules, the Massachusetts coaching staff can not comment on a recruit until he officially signs.

Camby cited the campus atmosphere and his relationship with UMass freshman Donta Bright as two reasons for coming to Amherst.

"I met Donta at the Boston Shootout and we got along really well," Camby said. "When I visited we got to talking and he played a big part in my decision to come to UMass."

Camby is considered a skilled athlete who can run the floor and score both inside and out. Some experts tout him as one of the top 10 to 15 high school seniors in the country.

"I'm a legitimate five (center)," Camby said. "I can run the floor, shoot the jumper and break guys down on the dribble."

Hartford coach Stan Perkowski predicts Camby will be "an NBA lottery pick by the time he's a senior."

"He has all the skills — physically he's one of the best in the country," Perkowski said. "He's big and fast. He's extremely agile, is a great finisher and possesess all the skills of a 6-foot-1 player."

Clark Francis, editor of Hoop Scoop magazine said, "he's real big but agile. He runs well and has good range on his shot. He's a big time signing for UMass."

Camby, who visited campus in September, chose UMass over Connecticut, Boston College, Providence, Wake Forest, Syracuse and Villanova.

"He chose UMass because he likes the school, he likes the coach and it is a good situation where he'll have good chance to play," Perkowski said.

Camby did not play basketball last season because he had transferred schools and was forced to sit out a year.

"He hasn't played much in high school but once he gets on a real court, with a real team and starts playing he'll take off," Perkowski said.

Camby has not yet passed his SATs but he is expected to do so this fall.

Camby is the third top prospect to verbally commit to Massachusetts this year. Springfield Central's 6-foot-2 point guard Edgar Padilla, who is considered one of the top 50 preps in the nation, committed in September.

Carmello Traveiso, a 6-foot-2 guard from Boston, committed last week and is considered one of the finest three-point shooters in New England.

"They are getting it done up in Amherst," Francis said. "John Calipari and his staff are doing an unbelievable job recruiting."

Field hockey hosts BU rematch

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Rivals always seem to push each other a little bit more. When two rival teams get together on a playing field, there is always more aggression, more determination and more at stake.

The matchup between the University of Massachusetts field hockey team and the Boston University Terriers can definitely be called a rivalry.

The No. 4 Minutewomen (14-1) take the field today at 3 p.m. at Totman Field against the fiesty Terriers with a lot riding on the outcome. Having played a number of patsies lately (Dartmouth, St. Joseph's and Rhode Island), the Minutewomen need the BU game to see how good they really are.

The rivalry between the city women and the country women has a long history. In 1989, UMass ended BU's season in Boston in the NCAA Tournament with a triple OT penalty stroke victory in Boston.

In 1990, the Minutewomen beat the Terriers 1-0 at Totman, but they lost last year's contest 3-0 in one of the most stinging defeats of the year. UMass was without head coach Pam Hixon for the game, and the team simply did not come to play. Their chance for revenge comes today.

The Boston University (12-2) squad has posted an impressive record, with their only losses coming at the hands of No. 2 Iowa and No. 8 Ball State. Now at Number 10 in the country, the Terriers have reeled off a nine-game winning streak.

They would like to finish the regular season on a high note and ease into the NCAAs, but they end with three New England teams on the road in a row: UMass, UConn and Northeastern. The Terriers must beat at least one of these teams to get into the NCAAs.

UMass is now number one in New England, but they must win to retain the honor. BU is number three in NE, and while the selection committee of the NCAAs usually selects three and sometimes four teams from the region, the Terriers would like to knock off their old nemesis.

UMass has reeled off a four-game winning streak of their own, but the team must continue to win to maintain their stay at number four in the country, which they have occupied for three straight weeks. Forward Ainslee Press leads the UMass offense and has literally carried the scoring burden with her 19 goals and two assists. Press was named Atlantic 10 Offensive Player of the Week for her six goals in three games, winning the award for the second time this year.

Goaltender Philippa Scott won Defensive Player of the Week for the third time this year. Her stalwart defense of the UMass cage was key in victories over Villanova, URI and Dartmouth last week. Scott's goals-against average is now 0.57.

Jen Nixon and Chris LaPointe are the Terriers' top guns. Nixon leads the team in goals (10) and points (17). LaPointe has six goals and eight assists.

Scott's Shots

This week's space comes from a remote terminal in Lot 22 as we continue to test how long it will be before somebody forces us to go inside the Stadium.

"Hey, throw on another burger."

• Here's to the cop who on Saturday said, "The Athletic Department would appreciate it if you went into the game, but hey, it doesn't really matter."

To which someone in the tailgating crowd responded, "What game?"

• It should come as no surprise that the Canadian flag was upside down on Sunday. Did you see the way the Marine Corps wear their hats? The rims are down around the bridge of the nose, it's a wonder they can walk without tripping.

David
SCOTT

• Attempting to steer his team away from their two-game losing streak, women's soccer coach Jim Rudy decided not to shave. The sight of JR with a beard is enough to make anyone run faster, kick harder and win.

Along the same line, I've decided to let my scruff go until the Bickering Boys from Foxboro get on the right track. They can only afford one more loss to have any hope of making the playoffs.

Whatever It Takes.

• Complaints have been pouring in over last week's swipes at professional hockey. It's not discrimination — if I had any college hockey knowledge I'd take swipes at that too.

However, it is apparent that scores have been higher this season. I attribute this to the new puck, or perhaps the cork filled sticks, or maybe it's the artificial ice.

• This year's Midnight Madness will feature a John Calipari Look-A-Like contest. Anyone wishing to borrow a Calipari-A-Like tie can find me at the Montague Inn. Early favorites are Rich Tettemer and Joe Pesci.

• The Shirl offers this Pearl on Deion Sanders. "The guy's team just won one of the most exciting playoff games ever and all he can do is throw buckets of water on that nice announcer? What's the matter with him, didn't his mother bring him up better than that?"

The Shirl. More than just a mother, a way of life.

• Chris Ford might have to give Sherman Douglas the starting nod solely for his fight against Larry Krystkowiak last Saturday. Gotta love the tenacity.

• If early commitments are any indication, Coach Cal and his assistants are certainly doing some serious recruiting. When you start taking players away from the UConn's of the college hoops world, you're in pretty good shape. It says a lot for the program Cal's built.

• I'd take Clinton over Bush one on one, any day. But Bush's height gives him the edge over Perot.

• Sure Dave Winfield's been around as long Dick Clark, but he can still play baseball. The same cannot be said for Jeff Rear-Don(e). That's the first

Jacobs stuns UConn with four goals

Junior sets the pace for 4-0 victory; Minutemen now at 9-4-1

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

Don't believe the hype. For Randy Jacobs, this is not a cliche to live by.

The junior forward tallied four goals yesterday for the University of Massachusetts men's soccer team (9-4-1), leading a 4-0 whitewash of the University of Connecticut yesterday at Garber Field.

Jacobs did not wait long against the Huskies to continue his scoring rampage of last week. Less than four minutes into the game, he chipped one past UConn sophomore goalie Tim McCarroll, giving the Minutemen a 1-0 lead.

Junior Justin Edelman took a throw-in about 30 yards outside of the box for UMass, as the Huskies Adam Linker misplayed the ball. Jacobs slipped by him, and came down the sideline. He faked the keeper inside and drove the ball to the outside post for the score.

McCarroll had only 13 minutes of experience before taking the field to start against the Minutemen. UConn coach Joe Marrone said it was his decision to go with NcCarroll instead of regular Sloan Spaeth.

The half ended with UMass leading by the same score, but that quickly changed when, at 50:43, Jacobs blasted a shot from the top of the box into the upper left corner of the net past the diving McCarroll, buring the Huskies for good at 2-0.

"I got the hype (on being named Co-Athlete of the Week and Atlantic 10 Player of the Week), and I wanted to come out and prove it legit," said Jacobs, who added two goals later in the game, pushing his team lead to 13.

On the other side of the ball, the UMass defense did an incredible job of clearing the ball out of their own end.

"This was the best we've played all year defensively, and our defense starts the offense," said Koch.

Junior co-captain Todd Kylish and sophomore Mike Doyle contributed immensely to the stellar play of the Minute-

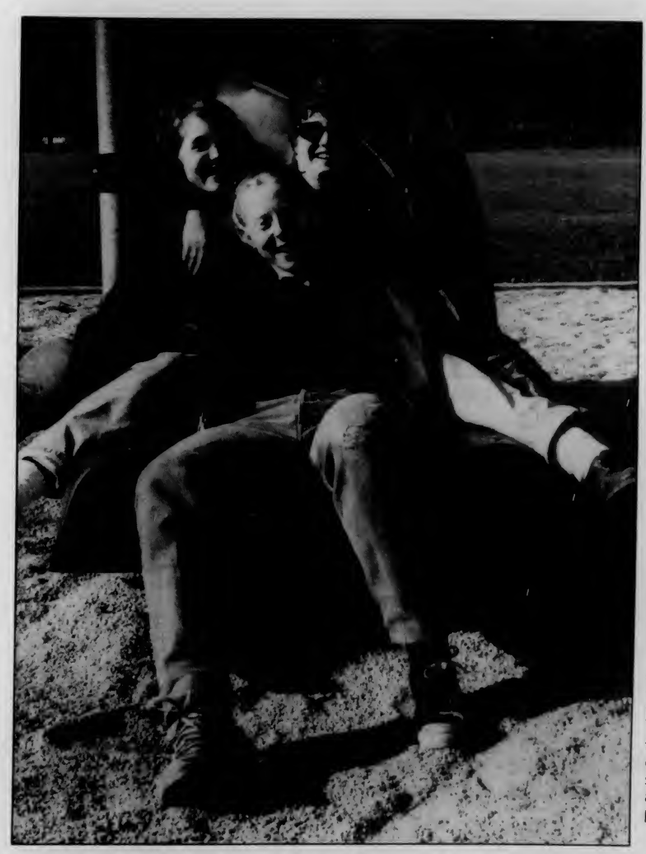
FLOWER THIEF

a band that's clearly going places stops at the iron horse along the way



FLOWER THIEF COURTESY FLOWER THIEF

By KIP MANLEY
Collegian Staff

A brand new Flower Thief will be unveiled at the Iron Horse this weekend.

Guitarist Christine Geisler and bassist Jen Gallahorn will be joined by their new partner Amy Green, who brings to the band a melodicon, a stand-up drum kit (including a cymbal made of bicycle parts) and a "whole lot of flutes." Green, who has performed before as a solo artist in the Valley, also brings her own songs to the band, raising the number of songwriters in this trio to three.

Their show on Sunday the 25th will be their first concert since their successful tour of the South and points Midwest earlier this summer, which included opening for Phranc in Pittsburgh. They've spent the time since then squirreled away, writing new material and rearranging the old songs, taking time out to laugh at the occasional presidential debate.

This will also be their first headlining concert at the Iron Horse. They were to have shared the billing with the Ellen James Society, but the Atlanta-based band has cancelled their entire tour, leaving Flower Thief with two sets all to themselves.

"We're really excited about the show," says Chris Geisler. "Our new songs are different, we're really expanding, taking a lot of chances with the songwriting. And all the old material sounds different to me. We have a new sound, a new identity here — I don't know what it is, but I haven't heard it before."

They will be playing the acoustic stage at CBGB's in New York the night before, so "hopefully we'll work out any opening-night jitters."

So what can you expect? Only some of the finest "alternative folk" — or whatever we're calling it these days — with touches of classical and jazz and tight vocal harmonies. And an early taste of a band that's clearly going places.

Doors open at the Iron Horse for dinner at 5:30 this Sunday, and the show begins at 7:00. Phone 586-8686 for ticket information.

THIS WEEKEND

There's nothing arousing about Erotica

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Erotica
Madonna
Maverick/Sire

If Madonna's new album, erroneously titled Erotica, is any indication of where the Material Girl is heading, I think it's time for her to stop reinventing herself and pack it in. This time, the master manipulator serves up lyrically banal and pseudo-house claptrap, all with the premise that she's actually doing something daring.

Her first mistake with Erotica is getting rid of her two previous writing partners, Patrick Leonard and Stephen Bray, who, respectively, penned the majority of Madonna's best songs, from "Open Your Heart," "Express Yourself" to "Oh Father." Instead she employs the vapid Shep Pettibone, who co-wrote "Vogue." While this gives Erotica a different sound, it's not necessarily better.

Most of Erotica is painfully repetitive and almost exhaustively empty. The first single, "Erotica," begins an annoying trend that extends throughout the 14 track, 75 minute album: Madonna's spoken voice. She introduces herself in the patented breathless voice that ignited "Justify My Love," chanting "My Name is Dita/I'll be your mistress tonite/I'd like to put you into a trance." And what an uneventful trance it is.

Her continued reliance on her words rather than her voice makes the entire disc seem like a bad extention of "Justify My Love." A trio of poorly written diatribes on men and 'love:' "Bad Girl," "Waiting" and the embarrassingly cliche "Thief of Hearts." Thief of Hearts? Lyrics like "you're a thief of hearts/and now you have to pay/how many licks does it take/...which leg do you want me to break?" dotted with an occasional 'bitch' make the song comical — though Madonna delivers it with a straight face.

The emptiness of "Theif of Hearts" is nothing compared to the almost ironic "Words," where she actually utters one of the most overused metaphors in musical history: "Words/They cut like a knife/cut into my life." And an extended rap (that's right, rap) try the listener's patience with its utter uselessness. Never has a Madonna album been such a chore to get through.

Not that the woman who would "seduce the world" doesn't inject some perverse and enjoyable tidbits, they're just hard to find. Her remake of Peggy Lee's "Fever" is serviceable, but perplexing, she doesn't play with the coyness of it, instead she grinds it down to an annoying whine.

On "Where Life Begins," arguably the most 'controversial' track, Madonna invites the listener to discuss "dining in and eating out" (nudge, nudge). She offers "if you'd like to learn/a different kind of kiss." There also some references to Colonel Sanders and KFC's famous tag line but I think you can draw your own conclusions.

The best tracks are the ones that break free from the synchronized repetitiveness that makes up the bulk of the album. Tracks like "Bye Bye Baby" and "Deeper and Deeper" work because they actually have a melody, though the unimpressive hooks won't leave you singing along — they're too static. And her continued use of samples and arrangements from her own songs keep reminding the listener of better songs and better lyrics.

The one song that jumps off of Erotica, mainly because it resembles "This Used to Be My Playground" is "Rain," and effective ballad that unfortunately sounds like Madonna doing a Belinda Carlisle tune. This, along with "Where Life Begins" show some imagination in the lyrics, something that is severely lacking here.

Erotica is by far Madonna's most dissapointing and amateurish effort. It never nears the confessional wonder of her best, Like A Prayer or even the wit and cleverness of the underrated Dick Tracy-inspired I'm Breathless. It's not even particularly arousing, just stilted and repetitive. If this is as erotic as Erotica gets, I'll pass.

Luxurious Of Mice and Men; brain-dead Consenting Adults

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Straight from high school reading-list oblivion, Of Mice and Men is a beautiful and literate wonder of a film. Hyphenate Gary Sinse has taken one of the great American novels by James Steinbeck and nurtured it into an emotion-filled ride of love and tragedy.

Sinse, who co-starred in this year's sleeper, A Midnight Clear, directs Men with an obvious care and love for the novel. From a faithful script by Horton Foote (Tender Mercies), Sinse has breathed new life into an American classic.

To all those who never even read the Cliff Notes of Men, it tells the story of two drifters, the practical and simple George (Sinse) and the the retarded and kind Lennie (John Malkovich). Their story, as they work the land at a farm and dream of a distant, ten-acre lot where they can work and live, is the centerpiece of a complex film that can be enjoyed and understood on many levels.

In immediate retrospect, Steinbeck's novel is now somewhat familiar territory. The supporting characters seem like stock, yet Men's freshness was never its lure. There's the farm owner's ornery son (Casey Sziemasko), his beautiful but lonely wife (Sherilyn Fenn, who has Symbol written all over her), the token black (Joe Morton), the kind team leader and the tired old man (Ray Walston).

But Men transcends mere ninth grade analysis to deliver what is arguably one of our most emotional and textured novels, something Sinse transfers almost perfectly to the screen. His vistas are few but brilliant, the staging simple and fluid, and the performances untouchable.

The loaded role of Lennie is filled with easy to fall into traps, the 'simpleness' of the role usually sets an actor's gears in motion, but Malkovich never resorts to easy sympathy or sentiment, so his Lennie seems less theatrical (and dare I say less gaudy) than Dustin Hoffman's Rainman, an obvious comparison.

To say that Malkovich gives a tour de force performance would not only be using a horrible cliche but not do the underrated actor justice. Malkovich, who played Biff in a wonderful television version of Death of a Salesman with Hoffman and the rakish Valmont in the superior Dangerous Liaisions (his best performance to date), eclipses most of his past portrayls to deliver a complicated role without the manipulativeness one might expect.

Sinse, however, should not be overlooked in a role that isn't as straightforward as it seems. Sinse works well with Malkovich, coming off less like a overprotective big brother and more like a (if you'll excuse the Shirley MacLaine-ness of the phrase) soul mate.

Sherilyn Fenn, toned down as less of a tramp than in the novel, gives a breathless performance that surpasses the almost standardness of the 'lonely wife' role. But who would've ever thought she'd be outdone by My Favorite Martian Ray Walston, who excels in a roller-coaster of a scene that'll drain your tear ducts without making you groan.

Of Mice and Men is a small treasure of a movie, a simple yet layered beauty that is filled with outstanding performances, a fine script and some of the most vibrant images this side of a Ridley Scott movie. Of Mice and Men deserves the all the audience and attention it receives. And how many movies can you say that about?

Grade: A

Consenting Adults — Intelligence Alert! This wholly brain dead, ridiculously predictable and embarrasingly acted 'thriller' hinges on enough coincidences to fill a couple of seasons of Murder, She Wrote and an entire Nancy Drew series combined.

Kevin Kline, looking as though he lost a bet, meanders through a role with his old January Man co-star Mary Elizabeth Mastrantonio as a yuppie couple who befriend their next door neighbors, only to be trapped in a web of deciet and murder. The film tries to be lurid, but the set up is soooo unbelievable that anyone with wits in hand would see a mile away what's going to happen.

Kevin Spacey (Glengarry Glenn Ross) and Rebecca Miller (Wind) play the neighbors, who have more candles in their house than Yankee and (I love this) have billowing curtains on their ceilings and blood red walls. Hmmm. Wouldn't this, coupled with Spacey's creepy attitude send people with a clue reeling?

Both Kline and Mastrantonio vainly try to cling on to their dignity by bringing a thirtysomething-type marital angst to Adults, but the blatant stupidness of this film overwhelms anything even remotely credible. I mean, how many times are we going to sit through a supposedly tense climax when the outcome has been done to death? At least no one gets impaled here.

Most could be forgiven if at least Adults could be considered a guilty pleasure, like chuckling at Rebecca DeMornay's howlingly perverse nanny in Hand that Rocks the Cradle or sitting through Pacific Heights hoping (and I know I wasn't the only one) Michael Keaton would staple-gun Melanie Griffith to death. But Consenting Adults is so horrendously bad that it doesn't merely insult your intelligence, it slaps you in the face as well.

Grade: D-

Jazz ensemble promises an eclectic program

By RACHEL D. MEDANIC
Collegian Correspondent

The best the UMass Music Department has to offer is bound to shake your halls and rattle your walls with the sound of Big Band Jazz this Saturday night at the Fine Arts Center.

The evening will be performed by Jazz Ensemble I and Chapel Jazz, two 18 piece bands of three in the music department.

The evening promises, "For Big Band music, to be an eclectic...two hours," according to music director Jeff Holmes. The performance day was changed to Saturday to accomodate parents weekend.

Featured performances are Ensemble I's Somba-rhythmed "Ride to One-Hundred Islands," which is composed by student Phil Whittall, arranged by senior music major Doug Olsen and has one of two saxaphone solos being performed by Jerry Merra. Merra's other solo comes in an Oliver Nelson ballad entitled "Black, Brown and Beautiful."

An "uptempo, flagwaver jazz guitar piece with a little of Rod McConnell in it," according to Holmes, entitled "Love For Sale" features the arrangement of Olsen and Carlos Bermudo on jazz guitar.

Under the direction of Professor David Sporny, Chapel Jazz is featuring Keith Foley'a arrangement of Charlie Parker's tune "Confirmation."

On a more tradtional note, Duke Ellington's "Rockin' In Rhythm," Thad Jones' "Three In One," and Bob Mintzer's "Christopher Columbus" will be performed by Ensemble I.

Another Latin/Somba piece entitled "Hey Momma Your Somba's On Fire" is also on the list. Junior music major Adam Scott, a trumpet player for Chapel Jazz said, "I can play any note I want and it sounds like I'm a genius." He says the slow-moving chords give him "time to think."

Both Jazz Ensemble I and Chapel Jazz have been recognized in the past. Ensemble I has recently been invited to play this coming March at the National Conference of Eastern (seaboard) Music Educators. Chapel Jazz, playing at Boston University by invitation last spring, was chosen "Outstanding Band."

Also in the unofficial stages of planning is a CD with the work of both groups scheduled to be on it. Sporny says the CD would act like an athlete does for a college team in promoting. The CD would be used for student recruitment, university fundraising and departmental promotion. The CD is a joint effort between the department and Kappa Kappa Psi that is trying to become a reality.

Convention transports you to another world

By KIP MANLEY
Collegian Staff

Watch the skies. They're back.

The Eighth Annual Not Just Another Con descends upon the Campus Center this weekend, transporting it temporarily to another world where mythical monsters, fanciful aliens and mighty heroes roam free, swapping tales, trading jokes, and generally having the time of their lives.

NJAC is a convention of the fans of the genres of fantasy and science fiction scattered across all the various media of popular entertainment, from movies to books to television to comics to games to radio plays to live theater. This year's theme is cyberpunk — for the uninitiated, think of Blade Runner — which means lots of sunglasses, black leather, computer chips, and power ties.

This is the oldest and largest fantasy and science fiction convention in Western Mass, and as such it draws a large number of fans and professionals every year. Special guests for this eighth convention include authors Jane Yolen and Hal Clement, artists A.C. Farley and Hanna Shapero, and UMass's own Samuel Delany. The Guests of Honor are Barry B. Longyear, author of the novel Enemy Mine; Mary Hanson Roberts, artist of a widely popular Tarot deck; and publisher Tom Doherty of TOR Books, a famous science fiction imprint.

The weekend will be chock full of goings-on, from serious (and not so serious) panel discussions — previous topics have included hypothetical alien sex, the philosophical implications of communicating with another race, how to create your own mythologies and religions, and how to career-track yourself for a job in today's space industries. Other events include art exhibits, film festivals, dances, storytelling sessions and readings by the authors, and trips to the UMass Observatory.

Memories and melodies fill serene Humroot

Humroot
Shelleyan Orphan
Rough Trade/ Columbia Records

Shelleyan Orphan's unique style of combining new age and alternative music comes out in an expressive and emotional way. Tracks like "Fishes," "Dolphins," and "Long Dead Flowers Dried Out in Summer" reach out to the feelings of the listener. Shelleyan Orphan's new album, Humroot, is incredible.

This new album, although seeming more melancholy than their last album, gives more of Orphan's true selves. The mellow distant sounds this group creates gives a familiar and comfortable feeling to those who listen.

Each song is like reading a giant book of memories and life. There are uplifting sounds that come from the track, "Supernature on a Superhighway" with lyrics that literally sprout ideas in the imagination: "When you find a rare flower/ Allow something in/ Something good/ And the garden empty now/ Will flower and flower." This spring of lyrics sounds like a combination of The Darling Buds and The Happy Mondays.

The sonorous vocals of Jemaur Tayle and Caroline Crawley compliment the tones of the keyboard. This is especially true in the track, "Little Death." This Celtic tune highlights the band's use of experimentation. This song catches all the sensitivity that this album was written with.

Boris Williams' use of drums is incorporated well into the delicately played music. A good example of this is in the first track, "Muddied Up." The soft and airy usage of

There will also be various contests, including a Masquerade, the Hastur Memorial Unspeakable Prose Contest (write your own very, very bad fiction), and the mystical Eye of Argon, about which nothing more can be said here.

Entrance to the convention is $19 at the door (with a three dollar discount to Five College Students before the convention begins). This one price covers all three days of events. instruments is what gives Shelleyan Orphan its unique tone and wispy feeling.

Compared to the tones of Century Flower, the band's first album, Humroot is a new step forward experimenting with different musical themes instead of just letting people hear what they are about. This musical growth will hopefully expand even more so in time. This is a band with a lot of energy, as well as a lot of potential for moving up the college charts.

Shelleyan Orphan's new album is definitely worth purchasing. Its tranquility is relaxing and at the same time not overbearingly so. It's good to sit back and think to, to let your mind wander, or even to get up and sway to. Pick it up, and let your mind drift to the mellow madness.

Outward Bound is non-stop musical joy

By BILL ROGERS
Collegian Correspondent

Outward Bound
Sonny Landreth
Prazis/Zoo

Louisiana native Sonny Landreth has been known to most people as simply the slide guitar player for John Hiatt and John Mayall. Not anymore, though. Landreth's debut solo album, Outward Bound is a masterpiece of country-tinged Southern rock.

As you can see, I liked it. No, I loved it. The guitar work was fantastic, as well as the bass (played by David Ranson) and the drums (played by Kenneth Blevins). The way they were thrown in with every type of music imaginable completely blew my mind.

It's nonstop action and suspense from the beginning. You just don't know what Landreth will do next, and, depending on how open you are to musical preferences, you could be absolutely thrilled with every song or perhaps like only one.

The lyrics were absolutely breathtaking. Although I pegged Landreth's music as country-tinged southern rock, there were many instances where the music sounded remarkably like blues, folk and Cajun gumbo music. It could also be considered new country, but the way Landreth uses these types of music, you'll find this thoroughly enjoyable disc will leave you hooked, as I was.

Sonny Landreth's anonymity works to his advantage — I didn't know what to expect when I first listened, but once the music starts taking off, you'll be gladly taken over.

The songs cover a wide array of feelings. "Soldier of Fortune," is one of the best tunes on the album and worth reciting is a line or two or three: "Coming and going/going 'til I was gone/I never meant to hurt you, baby/I never meant you wrong/ Rambled like a story/in a tugboat captain's song/the delta took me winding off/from where I once belonged..."

"Fortune" describes the mixed feelings a woman experiences when her husband decides to leave, successfully made into a metaphor by by using Vietnam as a setting instead of the relationship.

I found that Landreth's songs tend to be about collapsing relationships, whether straightforward, underlying, or, like "Soldier of Fortune," metaphorical.

For example, in "Back To Bayou Tech," Landreth says: "The wind tonight ain't all that cries/Leaves like tears fall outside/ She knows I'm blowing with the season change/look at me and hear her say/Lay, chere, just a little bit longer/you'll be gone so long out west/Stay, chere, just a little bit longer/do pass back to Bayou Tech."

The same goes for "When You're Away," which is a song that is crying about a loved one that is so far away. But, have no fear...the album is not filled with only depressing songs. The song "New Landlord" is an upbeat tune about the way a man becomes friends with his new landlord.

The entire disc is cool, as I've said time and time again, but if you want to take some time to listen to some awesome music that is, in my mind, one of a kind, listen to "Speak of the Devil." I have never heard a song as groovy (for lack of a better word) as this. It is, hands down, the most exciting song on the disc. The tune has kind of a bluesy overtone that tells the story of a woman Landreth knows who had the worst husband in the world, a non-stop drinker and a wife beater.

If y'all are looking for a disc that is as cool as a disc can be, Sonny Landreth's Outward Bound is it. Just mosey on down to the record store and grab this fantastic disc before they're all gone. I hate it when that happens, and if you don't hurry up, it just might happen to you. You won't regret it.

Innovative 'Fefu' keeps audiences on the move

'Fefu and her Friends' offers audience a chance to be part of the action

In the mood to be part of a play? If so, the original production of "Fefu and Her Friends" is just the ticket. The play, an engaging mystery by Maria Irene Fornes, is actually designed to keep audiences on the move and involved.

When eight women gather at Fefu's country house to plan a benefit, a bizarre mystery unfolds. "The audience is subjected to different physical perspectives of the play," says director El Lash. "People should come prepared to be engaged in a unique theatre-going experience." Lash is speaking of the innovative staging, where the audience will view six different scenes, each in a different space on the stage in Theatre 14.

"Fefu and Her Friends" will be shown Oct. 22-24 and 28-31 at Theatre 14 at the Mendenhall Center for the Performing Arts at Smith College. Tickets $4 general; $2 students/seniors.

State and student leaders rally for Clinton

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

While a handful of Bush supporters heckled and waved signs, about 250 Clinton supporters rallied yesterday by the campus pond. Several area Democrats and student leaders spoke in support of the Democratic ticket.

US Representative Joseph Kennedy, who attended the University, said that wages are going down and taxes are going up and that he is concerned about the economy.

Kennedy was interrupted during his speech by hecklers shouting, "four more years."

"Should we talk through them? Here what do you think?" Kennedy asked the crowd.

JOSH REYNOLDS/ COLLEGIAN

Rep. Joseph Kennedy addresses the crowd at the rally for White House frontrunner Bill Clinton Thursday at the Campus Pond.

The crowd enthusiastically cheered Kennedy on and he continued to talk above the hecklers. He said ordinary people need help, not Bush administration policies of giving tax breaks to the rich.

"I am already thanking them for what they have done for me," Kennedy said.

About 50 percent of inner city high school students drop out, and 40 percent under the age of 14 become pregnant, according to Kennedy. He blamed the Bush administration for these statistics.

"[You are] better off having a baby in Romania or Jamaica," Kennedy said. "[You are] more likely to die by the age of 20 in Harlem than in Bangladesh."

But Kennedy assured the crowd that young people have already made "a major change in the issues."

"The new struggle in America is women's wages," Kennedy said.

Women earn about 60 cents for every dollar men earn, according to Kennedy.

Kennedy, also said the public must improve race relations on campus.

Jen Wood, president of the Student Government Association, said the economy makes it difficult for graduating college students to find jobs.

"Most students graduating from UMass will not be celebrating. We see our recently graduated friends flipping burgers and pumping gas," Wood said. "We need

Republican Club plans Bush rally

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

With the election only two weeks away, political pundits are saying only a "a major scandal" would prevent a Democratic victory. In the wake of rallies, debates, conventions and stump speeches, the UMass Republican Club has been noticeably quiet.

But under new leadership, members of the club are planning to make their voices heard in the final weeks of the campaign with rallies scheduled for next week.

Kevin Jourdain, a senior political science and economics major said, "Bush is the only choice for leadership in the 21st century." He cited President Bush's qualifications in foreign affairs, domestic affairs, as well as the ever popular issue of character.

He believes Bush will be re-elected, but only by a narrow margin, because many have lost confi-

Student arrested on rape charges

By PAUL PRECHT
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Police Department reported an alleged rape of a 29-year-old female student in an academic building on Wednesday morning.

Police arrested a 32-year-old male graduate student on charges of rape, assault with intent to commit rape and indecent assault and battery on a person over 14. The student pleaded innocent to all charges in Northampton District Court Wednesday afternoon. He was released on $5,000 personal surety bail.

Pre-trial conference is set for November 12, 1992. According to the Daily Hampshire Gazette, Assistant Northwestern District Attorney is prosecuting the case.

There were 18 forcible sexual offenses at UMass in 1991, according to crime statistics provided by the UMass Division of Public Safety. Only one person was arrested, records show.

Women's sports teams reinstated

University now committed to equal opportunity plan

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

Members of the women's sports teams which were reinstated after the threat of a lawsuit are ecstatic and proud to be the driving force behind the "phenomenal" precedent they have set.

"We challenged the system and it worked and we won!" said junior co-captain Pam Levine, who is majoring in math. "I'm so excited. We totally shook up the system and UMass felt the heat. It's amazing."

Representing the lacrosse, tennis and volleyball teams, Patricia Flannery, a lawyer from the Boston law firm Thornton and Early, who specializes in sex discrimination cases, negotiated the settlement after threatening the University of Massachusetts with a lawsuit.

The university also committed to a five-year plan bringing the school's funding of women's sports into compliance with Title IX, a federal mandate which calls for equal opportunity between men's and women's sports.

Flannery thought the teams had a strong case after UMass eliminated all three teams over the last three years, while cutting only one men's team. While women comprise 50 percent of the undergraduate enrollment, the school currently offers women 30 percent of the opportunities to participate in varsity sports.

"You can't balance the budget by discriminating against women," Flannery said. "I'm really happy for the players. What happened to them was unfair."

Athletic Director Glenn Wong could not be reached for comment.

"It's about time our voices were heard," said Levine. "It's rewarding to see after all our work that we actually won," said Levine.

"I was very upset when they cut the [tennis] team. It was my main activity and it was so unfair," said senior HRTA major Kelly Grim. "They said there wasn't enough interest but obviously there was. It was ridiculous."

Rachael Splain, a senior education major who receives a four year scholarship to play on the lacrosse team is also excited about what she considers an achievement for women.

"It's definately a positive thing for women," said Splain. "Unfortunately it's my senior year and it would've been great if it happened earlier."

Flannery said the team tried to work within the system before contacting her. They did their own fundraising when their budget was cut for the 1990-91 season. But after they were eliminated last spring, Flannery said they were forced to go to court.

"The administration pushed us to the point of having no qualms about suing. We did something that other people are afraid to do. We showed that you shouldn't be afraid to stand up for your rights," said Levine.

"The fact that they cut these teams as the athletic

State employees' travel expenses questioned

BOSTON (AP)- A legislative probe into illegal spending at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst raised concerns about out-of-state travel by some state employees, according to a preliminary report released Thursday.

The House Post Audit and Oversight Bureau study concluded, "It appears that there is no coherent oversight policy for evaluating the necessity of out-of-state travel by administrators of state agencies and institutions."

The bureau report cited the university's School of Physical Education and said expenses could be cut at the Executive Office of Transportation and Construction and the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority.

The bureau said it would investigate "attendance at general conferences, sending multiple employees to the same event, and travel that combines personal activities and state business."

At the MBTA, employees' travel totaled $111,052 in fiscal 1992. The Post Audit and Oversight Bureau has not determined how much of that was charged to the state. One MBTA worker made two trips to Europe, totaling $8,070, to inspect ongoing T equipment construction.

Cooperation of Vietnamese praised by President Bush

By GEORGE GEDDA
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush on Thursday praised Vietnam's willingness to cooperate in accounting for missing American servicemen but said he doesn't see normal relations with Hanoi in the near future.

Bush left the impression in an interview with CBS that there will be no decision on normalizing relations before his term is finished meaning a decision may fall to Democrat Bill Clinton if Bush is defeated.

The president reaffirmed that normalizing relations with Vietnam will be linked to Hanoi's cooperation in accounting for the MIAs and hinted that an exchange of ambassadors could depend on whether Hanoi moves toward democracy.

The United States has never had diplomatic relations with the Hanoi government and maintains a trade embargo against Vietnam.

"I must be satisfied as president that all obstacles about POWs and MIAs have been removed," Bush said in explaining his requirements.

UMass Police Log

Compiled by Michael Day

Recent incidents recorded by the University's Department of Public Safety.

• Derogatory racial graffiti was discovered in a restroom in the basement of the Library on Wednesday morning, according to police. At 7:40 a.m., members of the Janitorial Staff discovered the graffiti in a handicapped stall and notified police, who are currently investigating.

• A woman was struck by a pickup truck as she was walking in the crosswalk behind Kennedy Residence Hall on Wednesday evening, according to police. The woman was reportedly struck as the truck was backing out of the roadway at approximately 9 p.m.

The truck left the scene after striking the woman, and a cruiser took the woman to University Health Services to be treated for injuries. Police are investigating .

Israel and Syria to talk

Withdrawal from Golan Heights discussed

By BARRY CHWEID
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Israel declared Thursday that it is willing to talk to Syria about withdrawing from the Golan Heights. A Palestinian representative called for a similar commitment to yield ground on the West Bank, in Gaza and in Jerusalem.

"We hope there will be a comprehensive commitment on all fronts," Hanan Ashrawi said. But she softened the demand by telling reporters that it was not a "precondition" to productive negotiations over Palestinian self-rule.

The territorial issue is one of the toughest items facing Arab and Israeli negotiators in their slow-moving peace talks. The Arabs' key demand is that Israel give up all the land they lost in the 1967 Six-Day War with the Jewish state. Israel's main quest is peace from its neighbors.

Until a Labor government took over last summer, Israel spurned any suggestion it give up land for peace. But in the last round of negotiations, which ended Sept. 24, Israel acknowledged that U.N. Security Council land for peace resolutions applied to the Golan Heights.

On Thursday Israeli negotiator Itamar Rabinovich told reporters at the State Department, where the talks will be held until Nov. 19, that "We don't shy away from using the word 'withdrawal' when appropriate."

He said, "When our quest for peace and our quest for security are satisfied, we will not shy away from introducing the element of withdrawal into a settlement."

This apparent concession was reinforced in Jerusalem by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. At the same time, though Rabin stressed that Israel was not prepared to give up all the land on its border with Syria.

"We don't want to repeat the price of peace with Egypt, but by the same measure, we do not believe one can achieve peace in exchange for peace alone," Rabin said.

Israel surrendered all of the Sinai desert, including its modern airfields and its only oil fields, in return for the 1979 peace treaty with Egypt.

Responding to Israel's gesture, chief Syrian negotiator Muwaffiz al-Allaf said "the first pillar" of any agreement "is complete withdrawal." The second pillar, he said, is to establish all of the annexed territory.

someone who has seen financial aid forms and eaten macaroni and cheese. Bill Clinton is that person."

When State Representative Shannon O'Brien rose to speak, she was heckled by Bush supporters.

"Come on Bush people let's here ya. You know what that is. That is the sound of the gag rule," O'Brien said. "Listen to that. That is the sound of ignorance. That is the sound of intolerance. That is the sound of closed minds talking.

"Yes, we are going to clean house. We are going to clean the White House," O'Brien said.

O'Brien accused the Bush administration of intruding on people's private lives. But O'Brien said she believes that Bush would not be re-elected, because he is so out of touch with the average person.

"This President is not going to eat macaroni, Jen," O'Brien said. "He is not going to get through the check out counter."

State Senator Stan Rosenberg said that Bush's trinkle down theory has not worked, while adding a large deficit.

"Vote like your future depends on it, because it does," Rosenburg said.

State Representative Ellen Story, State Representative William Nagle, and University Democrats' President Neil Carpenter spoke. United Staff Association's President Sheila Griffith, Rose Olver, who is John Olver's wife, and David Lenson, the president of Massachusetts professors, also addressed the audience. The event was part of the second Clinton Gore National Student Day. Campuses around the country held rallies to encourage college students to vote.

said travel expenses cited by the bureau involved trips to a national transit conferences, where employees were panelists, and a bus-driving competition.

In the European trip, an MBTA employee visited seven cities in seven days to look at trolley cars being considered for the Green Line which are more accesible to the disabled, he said.

Professor's new book celebrated

Pulitzer prize winning Blais signs books in Amherst

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

"My children usually ask me when I return home after work 'What did you do today?' and now I can finally answer 'I wrote a book,'" said Madeleine Blais, the author of the recently published book The Heart Is An Instrument: Portraits In Journalism.

Bruce Wilcox, director of the University of Massachusetts Press and publisher of the book, said, "The book is a collection of 15 memorable essays, vivid portraits that speak to the realities of contemporary American experiences."

Blais said she met Wilcox through her daughter who has been friends with his daughter since they were very young. "Wilcox has done an A-1 bang-up job on the presentation of the book, which is something journalists don't take for granted," said Blais, a professor of journalism at UMass and a winner of the 1980 Pulitzer prize.

During the celebration of the book's publication at Jeffery Amherst College Store, several of Blais's admirers and supporters came to purchase an autographed copy of the $24.95 book.

"I promised myself to write something meaningful in each person's book I sign," Blais said.

Manager of Jeffery Amherst College Store Ty Lorenzo said, "It was a good party with a very fine, nice turn-out of lots of people who like and admire [Blais]."

Journalism professor Norman Sims said he thought the book was great and wants to use one of Blais's pieces in his next anthology. "Her ability to make sense out of the most bizarre stories is what I like," he said.

Some of the stories Blais tells are of a homeless schizophrenic woman, a teenage prostitute with AIDS and a 12 year-old boy who murders his parents.

UMass racism is linked to hometowns

By TAMI MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

The history of racial tension in the Greater Boston area and the "defacto segregation" of white suburbs also has an impact on the racial tensions on this campus, according to a University of Massachusetts administrator.

According to Grant M. Ingle, director of the office of human relations, 60 percent of the students at UMass are from the Greater Boston area.

"Large numbers of students come here from prejudiced White areas, with a naive set of prejudices and stereotypes about people of color," Ingle said. "Every year the University is forced to do remedial multicultural education because behavior in the home community has not been challenged."

"The Boston bussing crisis in the 70s made it clear that racial antagonism is alive and well and unaddressed in the Boston area," he said. Ingle said this problem is not unique to Boston and that other universities face similar situations with students from predominantly White suburbs.

Eric D. Martellini, a senior studying sports medicine, who is from South Boston, agreed.

"You stay in one place, you live in one place and you experience one kind of person," Martellini said, referring to Boston residents. He said his impression is that many people rarely venture out of their section of Boston and visit areas beyond Boston even less.

"People get really confused," Martellini said citing "territorial tension" which occurs in Boston. He said that people who are used to having their "place" find it difficult to adjust to a campus where

Joe Kennedy joins NoHo's Clinton rally

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — A vote for Democrat Bill Clinton represents a vote for hope and change, according to several local legislators who spoke at press conference highlighted by the appearance of U.S. Rep. Joseph Kennedy yesterday.

Kennedy was joined by state Sen. Stanley Rosenberg, state Rep. Ellen Story and Northampton Mayor Mary Ahearn at the conference at Northampton City Hall.

Kennedy said it is important for Democratic voters to guard against overconfidence in the two weeks prior to Nov. 3 and that supporters of the Clinton-Gore campaign need to work hard until that time.

"We have to work together and band together," Kennedy said. "The one thing that is unifying the people in this country is fears about their jobs and their future.

"Bush promised to create a lot of jobs in this country," Kennedy said. "I guess he did keep that promise — the problem is that most of those jobs are in Germany and Japan."

Although the presidential election will draw top billing in the Nov. 3 election, Clinton organizers expressed hope that the momentum of the Clinton-Gore ticket will help local Democrats.

Cindy Langley, the Northampton organizer for the Clinton campaign, said the campaign is focusing on voter registration and raising awareness among citizens about the aims of the Clinton campaign.

"I get the sense that momentum is very high — people are going to come out and vote for Clinton," Langley said.

Langley added that she believed

Researchers assembled

Women's Studies research facilitated

By MICHAEL B. PIERCE
Collegian Correspondent

The Five College Women's Studies Research Center is the first multi-campus center of its kind.

Gail Hornstein, director of the Center, said the Center's main goals were to provide a place for researchers to work and offices for people studying abroad.

Naomi Graetz teaches English at Ben Gurion University of the Negev in Beersheba, Israel, and came to the Center to research a book she is writing, "The Battered Woman in the Jewish Tradition: Metaphor and Halacha."

"This is a wonderful opportunity to write in a supportive atmosphere," she said. "I have a husband and three children and community obligations. Sometimes it is difficult to work at home. This gives me a chance to focus on the book."

Graetz said she heard about the program through an advertisement she received in Israel.

"This looked like it would be perfect for me," she said. "I left America in 1967, and I was glad that I had the opportunity to come back and work in New England."

Research associates apply to the Center for terms of residency ranging from several months to one year.

Hornstein said applicants are selected based on the excellence of their work. A committee consisting of one representative from each of the five colleges makes the decision.

Out of nearly 80 applicants, 21 were selected for this year.

While in residency, each associate must give a lecture on her work. These lectures are part of a program where the participants critique and respond to each other's dence in his ability to lead. "It won't be a rout for Bush, but it will be as close as the Democrats are going to get for a long time," said Jourdain.

According to Phil Brunault, a junior history major and chairman of the Young Americans for Freedom, one of the reasons for the club's inactivity is last semester's aggressive campaign for Patrick Buchanan, former Republican presidential hopeful. Also, campaign advisors for Bush are reluctant to spend money on a primarily Democratic state. This leaves the club with less campaign literature.

Brunault said he believes that "Clinton is too far to the left." He said that Bush, on the other hand, is the conservative man's choice and is not afraid to take a strong stand on the issues.

Members of the Republican Club also attacked Clinton's economic plan. Jennifer Fazzi, junior political science and economics major and vice-president of the UMass Republican Club, said that if Clinton were elected, "we would experience the most hellacious economy this country has seen in years."

John Reardon, a senior political science major, said, "Clinton wants to turn this country into an agrarian society." He also said that Clinton would try to turn the country away from industry, only further weakening the economy."

They also have a few rallies of their own planned for the upcoming weeks.

Next Wednesday will bring "Clean the House" rally. This gathering will be to further educate voters in the hopes of electing more Republicans to Senate and Congressional seats.

The following day will host the semester's first on-campus Bush/Quayle rally. The club is hoping to get across it's message before the election.

department increased money to the basketball and football teams made it so clear that this was discrimination," said Flannery. "They had money for women and they chose to give it to the men."

The conditions of the agreement include: restoration of the teams' competitive schedules and budgets without any money being taken away from other women's sports, reimbursing the students legal costs and attorneys' fees, the resurfacing of the tennis courts, uniforms and a regional coach. Tennis and lacrosse are scheduled to start up this spring and volleyball next fall.

"Both [the Athletic Director] and [UMass President] were instrumental but it was the threat that made them act immediately because they knew they were going to lose," said Flannery. "It's wonderful that they did the right thing."

A switch from how they were previously treated, Levine agreed "they're actually doing it right. We're being treated like a varsity team and not a burden to the department."

Stacy Scheckner, a junior pshychology major and member of the tennis team said after the team was eliminated the administration discouraged the team, saying there was "no way and no how" to reinstate the team.

"It's [reinstatement] almost like a miracle," said Scheckner. "We deserve to have it back."

Julia Richardson, a senior journalism major, said "Maddy takes people who are off the beaten path and makes them accesible to the reader." She said it wasn't everyday a person has the opportunity to hear the story of a homeless person or an AIDS victim."

Wilcox said he would be pleased if the book received a great review in home-town papers and a positive review in the New York Times Book Review. "So far half my wish has come true because the book has received some great local review," he said.

Wilcox said he considered Blais's depth of insight is very unusual. "She has the acute ability to capture the emotional and psychological reality of her subjects' worlds," he said.

Noah Jorgensen, assistant manager of Jeffery Amherst College Store, said the store has about 30 book-signing parties a year because they feel it develops a good relationship with people in the area and they like the opportunity it brings to sell books.

"The party gives the author and publisher a chance for publicity where publicity is due," said Jorgensen.

Howard Ziff, professor of journalism, said, "What can I say. I love Maddy and I love her work."

Clinton's support will help local political candidates. U.S. Rep. John Olver of Amherst is facing a tough race with Rep. Patrick Larkin, while Rosenberg is being opposed by Independent Donald Gallagher.

Story, who is unopposed, said the increased interest in politics resulting from the presidential election helps to open up the political process. She noted that approximately 2,000 students were registered to vote at UMass earlier this month.

"People will come out to vote," Story said, adding that she hoped the increased turnout would help Olver's bid to return to the U.S. House of Representatives. "It's not very exciting to come out to vote for someone who is running unopposed."

Story said she felt a Democratic victory would help to reverse the Conservative trend on the Supreme Court following 12 years of Republican leadership and that Clinton could help the United States undergo a gradual economic recovery.

"All you have to do is think about the Supreme Court and realize that its time to have a [Democratic] victory," Story said. "The Supreme Court needs justices who will be sensitive to the needs of those who are less fortunate and will protect abortion rights.

The decision to have sex doesn't belong to men only

Stacy
MALONE

Rape. It happens. We all know it happens. Not always in a back alley, a dark parking lot or by a stranger. Rape happens in your own home, your friend's room and usually by someone you know.

What is rape? Rape is sexual intercourse by force. It has no boundaries of where it can happen, who it happens to or who is the rapist.

Why does rape happen? Was the woman drunk? Was her skirt too short? Did she put out signals that she "wanted it?" Did she go to the man's room? None of those circumstances are reasons to violate a woman's body.

A woman is wearing a lot of makeup, her skirt is extra short and her shirt very tight. She decides to go back to a man's room after they studied at the library or after drinking at a party. This does not mean she wants to have sex. No matter where a woman goes, what she is wearing or whether she is drunk or sober, she is never asking to be raped. Women don't ask to be raped, but they are.

Men often take it upon themselves to decide when a woman wants sex. It does not seem to matter whether the woman wants to have sex or not, because if the man does he can make sure he gets it. Men need to listen and let the woman decide for herself. If a woman says no, that's it. It doesn't matter if you think she is just teasing and really wants it or she's drunk and you don't think she'll notice or care — she said no.

A man takes a woman on a date. They go out to eat, a movie, whatever and he pays. She goes home with him and he wants sex. The woman owes him nothing and he does not have the right to take anything away from her.

Rape takes many things from a woman. It steals her security, her dignity. When sex is forced on a woman, a man has temporarily satisfied his sexual appetite while the feeling of victimization rape causes may never leave the woman.

A man and a woman are friends. They know each other well and he decides he wants more than friendship. Maybe he wants a relationship with her. He hasn't decided whether or not he wants a commitment, but has decided he wants to have sex with her.

Would you ever think your friend would force intercourse on you? Isn't a friend suppose to understand how you feel and know when you say no, you mean no? Well, it happens.

In the Everywoman's Center 1991 Fiscal Year report there are statistics of the number of people who attended workshops addressing date rape and abuse in relationships through the Educator/Advocate Program. There were 29 abuse and respect in relationships workshops; 491 people attended. Twenty dating violence workshops were held and the attendance was 893 people. The rape and date rape workshops had an attendance of 808 people.

Rape is a serious issue on this campus. Forcing sex on a woman is rape, whether the man believes the woman wants sex or not. Women have the right to decide if they want to have sex and no man should steal that right away.

Just say no to Slick Willie

Michael
MORRISSEY

In student politics this week, the best man for the job lost in his bid for speaker in the Student Senate. To intelligent senators, Kevin Jourdain was the only choice. Unfortunately, the little Caesars insist on acting like the state pols, because they elected a man who, I'm told, is slightly to the left of Michael Dukakis. Well, another liberal Democrat around here to run things, what else is new?

The 1992 presidential race is, as always, a turning point in all our lives. I'll admit, I was a little premature last spring with my column, "Bush clinched re-election," but as I am a man, I will admit my mistakes. By just doing so, I have proven to be one notch more mature than Bill (Slick Willie, Bubba, Pookie, the Gub'nor) Clinton. This column is devoted to the top 1001 reasons why not to vote for Slick Willie.

No. 1: Dishonesty. Clinton has proven time and again what a slippery snake he is by failing to come forth on a number of issues. He has failed to divulge the truth on his draft record. First he says he wasn't, then he says he was, then he says he was deferred. We find a letter by him to a U.S. Senator saying, "Thank you for getting me out of the war. I don't know what I would have done if I was drafted."

Slick Willie has also denied inhaling marijuana, but admits to "experimenting" with the drug. Why would you try it if you weren't going to inhale? C'mon, that's like saying you were in another woman's bed, but you didn't have sex with her. Oh, hold on . . .

No. 2: Infidelity. I said it during the primaries, and I'll say it again: Slick Willie's got the only good-looking wife among the bunch (and as a throw-in, she's got a brain), but he goes off with a woman who spells Jennifer with a G. No wonder he took up jogging, he's had to run back home every morning for years.

No. 3: The anti-patriot. Clinton was 19 years old (the same age George Bush was when he was shooting down planes in World War I), when he decided to spend his time protesting the Vietnam War on foreign soil.

I'm sorry, but I agree with the president on this. To run amok in other countries protesting the United States is absolutely disgraceful. To supporters who use his age as an excuse, I submit that a president needs vision, and that action shows a lack of vision. Heaven forbid that Clinton was elected and the U.S. ever got involved in another war, having to reenlist the draft. Nineteen-year old kids would say, "F— the president. He didn't fight, so I sure as hell ain't." No man who doesn't believe in the principles of our country should be able to lead it. If you are called to fight, you fight. Case closed.

To go the whole nine yards, Slick Willie even went to Russia during the height of the Cold War. What is this man thinking? Slick Willie, maybe you can write this on your hand or something: U.S., good; Soviet Union, bad.

No. 4: Issues. And you guys thought I was holding out on you, but I simply saved the best for last. Even if you admit Slick Willie is a pot-smoking, poker-faced lying, Communist-loving, tax-and-spend liberal, maybe you like his stance on some of the issues. I'll play word association in the remaining space I have, using Clintonspeak and reality to show you what we're in for.

National health care equals Socialism, Communism, less money for us. Tax the rich equals . . . and the middle class and the poor and the dead and the. . . Revitalization of the economy equals 15 percent inflation, 30 percent misery index, odd license plates fill up on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday (for those of you youngsters out there, it means gas lines like those under Carter). Defense cuts equals Hi Saddam, hi commies, come waltz right in and take what you want, we won't stop you.

To summarize, all of us (except the professional protesters out there) will be in the work force four years from now. Do you really want your first paycheck slashed in half for some socialist program? Wouldn't you rather have the chance to save the money yourself and build your own American dream?

Fight racism by acting internally

I am tired. I am experiencing fatigue and a general lack of wellness. Why? Because y'all keep whining about "issues, issues, issues." Think carefully. Consider what your real opinions are. Weigh them against your true beliefs. If you're really honest with yourself, you'll find a contradiction. Consider what I am about to spew at you as diet for your brain. When you diet with food, you have to change the way you approach eating. I'm asking you to change the way you approach people and "issues."

Y'all wonder what to do about racism. How's this as a tactic: start with yourself. What's the real reason you're afraid to speak to that person with skin a shade different from yours? Is it really that you're afraid of saying the wrong thing? And if it is honestly that fear: who told you it was the wrong thing? The wrong terminology is really quite subjective. Try saying it and find out if it really is wrong for that situation. If it is wrong, you know not to use it again. If people get offended, that's A) their problem and B) your turn to apologize. In a complicated way, it really is that simple.

Another thing you can try is not using the word "minority," especially if you are classified as one. It implies a lesser status. Uncool. How can anyone be equal if they are called lesser? Next, attempt to describe people of races that are not your own as if they had no difference at all. How are we going to have a color-blind society if everyone is "the White guy," "the Black chick" or "the Asian dude?" It won't work. If everyone walked around in baggy clothes, ski masks and gloves, we'd have to say "the person who sings in the shower" or "that humanoid who listens really well." I'm just asking people to think about it. Just be aware of it and try to change it. Social change begins with the individual. In this case: think globally, act internally.

Alum harassed at Homecoming

During my visit to UMass for Homecoming, while sitting on the tailgate of my vehicle, sipping a beer, I was approached by a UMass policeman who requested my ID. Since I am well over 21 (Class of 1983), I chuckled but politely gave him my license. From out of nowhere, I was surrounded by three other policemen with very threatening expressions. The first officer accused me of selling beer to students, which was ludicrous since I was alone for 15-20 minutes.

The situation became even more bizarre when one of the officers claimed to have seen me accept money from a student. I was shocked. After a few testy moments, the first officer threatened to arrest me! I tried to explain I had been alone for some time, but he suggested I was calling him a liar! I now suspect they were just trying to provoke trouble, and at this point they walked away. In any event, all four were extremely rude and unprofessional.

I hope this type of police harassment is not common at UMass these days. I met and talked to other policemen on horses who were very courteous and polite, and I would like to think the above incident is unusual. I was a bus driver at UMass from 1978-83, and often depended on the police to assist with unruly passengers, and they always behaved professionally. Never have I seen the UMass police behave like the Gestapo.

I think that the University administration should investigate this problem, if indeed there is a problem. There certainly is with at least two officers. Police harassment of alumni at a homecoming football game is not going to endear the University to alumni, and will do little to improve fundraising during the current budget crisis. Needless to say, my day was ruined by this totally unnecessary act of four bullies in police uniforms, and if it happens again, I won't be back.

Civil disobedience brings change

In response to the unsigned editorial reflecting majority opinion of the Board Editors [Collegian, Oct. 14], I would like to inform the board that there is a vast difference between revenge and civil disobedience. The direct action taken in Washington tower as well as the occupation of Memorial Hall fit the latter category.

Our nation was founded on civil disobedience. I hope the board would be as quick to condemn such actions of our founding fathers as the "mob mentality" of the Boston Tea Party. Are they willing to denounce the actions of the Underground Railroad and Rosa Parks? They all broke laws. They did not rely on due process. Action has always preceded due process in bringing about social change.

In a future era, when they look back in astoundment at our racism and celebration of Columbus, it will be the occupiers of Memorial Hall and the stormers of Washington tower who will be called patriots.

MassPirg faxes information on Question 3 daily

By EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — The paper produced by the press release war over Question 3 may make up only a small part of the 6.5 million tons of trash the state generates every years, but for those on the receiving end, it piles up.

The Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group, which supports Question 3, sends a flurry of faxes on the issue almost every day.

"It is primarily to reporters who have asked for information on deadline," said Amy Perry, solid waste coordinator for MassPIRG. She estimated that she sends out about a dozen faxes a day.

"What we have tended to find is that in general whenever we drop materials off in person to avoid the fax, people always say they didn't get it," Perry said.

Because it has a special coating, fax paper cannot be recycled with regular white paper. Perry acknowledged that fax paper is difficult to recycle.

"We feel obligated to get the information out," Perry said.

"We would certainly prefer the mail."

Perry said that on her end of the fax line, MassPIRG uses paper with recycled content.

The industry-backed group that opposes the packaging measure says it favors waste reduction, although it touts alternatives to Question 3 for cutting down on trash. Jennifer Peck, a spokeswoman for the No on 3 Committee, said her group has only generated four press releases since the campaign started.

But Peck's group has been sending out copies of the 20-page initiative, so far the mailing has gone to about 3,000 people.

We've copied them on recycled paper," Peck said. "Anything we send out is on recycled paper."

Peck said the measure only goes out to people who request a copy. "That's not a waste. That is something for people (that) they are going to be voting on," she said.

Question 3 proposes setting standards so that packages would either have to be reduced in size, contain recycled materials or be reusable.

Debating the raising of the cigarette excise tax

BOSTON (AP) — Supporters of a ballot initiative that would raise the cigarette tax said Thursday a similar tax reduced smoking if California.

In California there was a 17 percent smoking rate decline after the 1988 initiative passed there, said John Pierce, director of cancer prevention and control at the University of California.

"This represents a doubling of the rate of decline nationally and the previous rate of decline in California," Pierce said.

Pierce conducted an evaluation of the effectiveness of the 1988 California ballot initiative which, like the proposed initiative in Massachusetts' Question 1, raised the excise tax on cigarettes by 25 cents. Pierce said the decline in smoking can be directly associated to the increase in cigarette tax.

Money raised from the tax in California has been used to finance smoking cessation courses in schools and community centers.

In 1988, the year the California measure passed, the per capita consumption of cigarettes in California was about 10 packs per month. As of January 1990, that figure had dropped to under nine packs per month.

In 1987, the year before the tax increase passed, 26.8 percent of California adults smoked. By 1990, that figure was down to 22.2 percent, or just over 4 million adults.

Opponents to Question 1 agree that it would reduce cigarette sales, but only because people go to other states to buy them.

"It will clearly cut down on consumption because people in Massachusetts will drive across the border and buy their cigarettes elsewhere," said Maryann Preskul-Ricca, a spokeswoman for the Committee Against Unfair Taxation.

such territories do not exist.

Ingle calls this "turf behavior" and a mentality that "you don't belong here." "There's an assumption on the part of White students that Black students are here unfairly, that they got here not on their own merits," Ingle said.

"It's my impression that in roughly half of all racial incidents the perpetrators are non-students and a preponderance of those perpetrators are from eastern Massachusetts," Ingle said. He said police records show that 50 percent of those arrested on campus are non-students and that he believed that many incidents where students were arrested, non-students involved.

He said he believed incidents often occur when friends and relatives of students from eastern Mass. visit the campus and there is a clash between what is acceptable behavior in hometowns and what is acceptable behavior on campus.

The failure of high schools to teach concepts of respect for diversity also contributes to racial tensions, Ingle said. He said he has spoken with high school administrators who say they do not have to deal with racial issues because there is no "minority presence" at their schools.

"High schools have driver's education, physical education and health education, but there is no multicultural education," Ingle said.

Ingle said this is a problem that employers and the military are also facing when dealing with high school students. He is seeking a grant from the Philip Morris Companies to provide incentives to faculty who create courses which would introduce students to multiculturalism in their first semester.

Nihilistic, immoral fun in Southwest

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

CBS was right when it branded Entertaining Mr. Sloane "one of the most immoral plays ever imported." They forgot to mention that it's also one of the funniest. Both a brilliant script from the late, great Britsh playwright Joe Orton and a stellar cast make this Sloane a smashing success.

This production, directed by second year UMass student Corey Pearlstein and produced in association with Hampshire Independent Productions and Residential Arts, is a hilarious (and gloriously tasteless) jab at the social mores of one British 'family' during the sixties.

Kath (played almost to perfection by Rachel Solomon) lives near a trash heap with her crusty father Kemp (Matthew Pitt). She invites the handsome (but ever so young) Sloane (Noah Simblist), a self-described 'orphan,' to stay with them. Kath, you see, wants to be Sloane's mummy. Enter Kath's brother, Ed (Pearlstein) who also has more than a passing interest in Sloane. And Kemp fears he knows the young man from somewhere...

Entertaining Mr. Sloane is rapid-fire black comedy that hinges on quick exchanges and almost constant sexual tension. The cast does a wonderful job, their scenes almost crackle with expert pacing, and thankfully, their British accents don't seem put-on or forced.

Rachel Solomon, a third year student at UMass, plays Kath with unmitigated hilarity. Her performance looks almost effortless; her style gives the "Mrs. Robinson"-type role a perfect amoral spin. Her scenes with Noah Simblist's Sloane bristle with some of the weirdest, yet most comedic sexual tension.

Pearlstein, who stepped in for a vacant Stephen Dedelus only a few weeks ago, does a bang-up job. His overlapping accent and keen mannerisms were well-played. His interaction play with Sloane doesn't take the low road with easy pathos, it's just as desperate as his sister's (and just as humorous).

Simblist, a first year Hampshire student, has the toughest going. Sloane is being used, knows it and in turn, uses both Kath and Ed. Simblist plays off of Solomon and Pearlstein with equal attentiveness, though he could have used less of that maniacal, fake smile in his more dramatic scenes.

Matthew Pitt wisely avoids most of the 'old-man' cliches that can easily peg an actor into overkill. Pitt has a more relaxed accent than the others in the cast (though one would think it would be the opposite) and gives a nicely restrained performance. He doesn't try to be as broad as the others and that works to his advantage.

Hampden Theatre proves a perfectly intimate setting for this in-your-face play. While a few technical foul-ups made for a ponderously long break in between the first two acts, the production was simple and let the actors shine. Even the goofy music that opened up the scenes, which annoyed me at first, somewhow fit in by the end of the evening.

Entertaining Mr. Sloane is witty, sometimes biting, theater served up with outstanding performances (especially Rachel Solomon) and rich ensemble work. Sure, it's nihilistic, immoral and desperately decadent, but it is also one of the funniest productions (intentionally, that is) to come out of UMass in a while.

Entertaining Mr. Sloane runs through Saturday at Hampden Theatre at 8 p.m. Tickets $4 general; $2 for students. Tickets can be purchased at the FAC and Hampshire College Snack Bar.

Views From Yet Another Campus

By MARK K. ANDERSON
Collegian Correspondent

A week ago, one wily, undercover UMass student spoke of his incognito trip to the world of a rigidly uptight college which (believe it or not) refused to feed him free of charge or board him overnight. Skinflints.

This past week, uninhibited by last week's failure or anything having to do with Rear Admiral Stockdale, he tried again.

Bennington College (in Vermont), much like The People's Republic of Hampshire, is in some ways just not fair game for a Campus Freeloader. It's far too easy. Posing as a student for a day or two and sponging off their system might prove more enjoyable if you didn't get the feeling that that's precisely what everyone else is doing.

Such groovy vibes do not come cheap, though. Clocking in among the five most expensive colleges in the country, this rustic, homey campus may look proletarian but the cellular phone in one student's bumperstickered Volvo revealed that we really were not down with The People anymore.

Other than in the playful fields of another college in South Amherst, one would be hard-pressed to find a more blissful ignorance of covert affluence.

Walking around the campus, I was continually reminded of a remark someone once made to me about an acquaintance: "You know, she's from Greenwich but I swear you couldn't tell it by the way she dresses." You mean the dreadlocks and unwashed Grateful Dead t-shirts are just a put-on? Get outta town.

Most of the above suspicions were further documented by the college's admissions pamphlet which proudly trumpets their lack of grades, majors or for that matter any notion of proper hygiene.

Now before some Bennington alum or hypersensitive Deadhead pulls out their typewriter and composes a scathing how-dare-you letter, let the fact be known that first of all "sophomoric" has three o's and second of all it's not my fault. It's that Democratic congress thing...that gridlock, tax-and-spend, trickle-down-government thing.

Anyway, despite our finding one chair too hard and one chair too soft, there really are great campuses across New England which, with a careful, steady approach and a pair of laboratory safety goggles, can be fun places for a faux-student to "attend" for a day or two. (The goggles are recommended for the more advanced student who feels they're ready for being trained in on the power tools.)

(Wait. How did that seventh-grade shop teacher get in here?)

In case there are those so inspired as to try Campus Freeloading on their own, the following tips may be of use.

Keep in mind that most people put on an easygoing, freewheelin' facade during their college years. This fact is of invaluable assistance to the Campus Freeloader.

As a result, almost any confrontation one might encounter can be met with an apologetic back-down or a simple (in Huck Finn's words) "stretcher." There's no need to weave complex lies or spin tales you're bound to forget. (Unless you happen to be a former member of the Reagan Administration. In that case, you're a True Patriot and have a Constitutional duty to craft a tangled mess of hyperbolic lies.)

This rustic, homey campus may look proletarian but the cellular phone in one student's bumperstickered Volvo revealed that we really were not down with The People anymore.

However, be careful when spilling your identity to people on the target campus. Roughly one-third of most campus populations would help with your charade provided there was no mention of things like probation officers, arrest warrants or any affiliation with the Manson family. Another third might shirk away but not tell any higher-ups either. The most dangerous third of any campus population would probably call America's Most Wanted on you if they had the chance.

Of course the trick, as any experienced Campus Freeloader will tell you, is to read which of the three types of confidants one encounters in any given face-to-face. (Hint: if the person is wearing one of those "D.A.R.E." buttons or still has their Junior Firefighter's badge from grade school, you might want to avoid letting on that you don't belong on campus.)

One experienced Amherst-area freeloader had these additional words of advice: "If you intend to sleep in a dorm lounge or take a shower and brush your teeth the next morning, figure out the logistics during the light of day — you look a lot less suspicious. If you're short on money, go to the campus food service a minute or two before they're scheduled to close. There's a good chance the work-study kid at the door has taken down the ID checker in which case you're golden. A quick line about leaving your wallet at the library and it's mealtime."

However, he cautioned, "In the end, showing something less than respect for the students, staff and grounds of your freeloading campus will come back to haunt you. The basic secret behind a successful Freeloading trip is simple common sense."

And don't forget your unwashed Grateful Dead t-shirt.

London based Daisy Chainsaw weirds out in America

By IAN CANADINE
Collegian Correspondent

Scruffy noise merchants Daisy Chainsaw have already made it pretty big on the UK independent scene (even making a dent in the mainstream charts) and are now looking to repeat their success on this side of the Atlantic with a tour and soon to be released album Eleventeen. They have already received quite a lot of attention here with their first two singles "Love Your Money" and "Pink Flower," which were released together on one CD earlier in the year.

Listening to the album feels like you are having weirdness packaged for you, rather than experiencing the genuine article.

The London-based four piece are fronted by singer Katie Jane Garside, who cultivates an image of corrupted little girl innocence and barely restrained madness, appearing on stage covered in mud and twigs and staring wide-eyed like her mind is several places removed from its immediate surroundings. Musically, the band employs a combination of grinding rhythms and bludgeoning fuzzy guitars to accompany Katie Jane's maniacally cackling and gasping vocals, with the occasional oddly mellow interlude, as on "Natural Man" and "Use Me Use You."

The influence of American noise bands of the mid-80s like Big Black and Swans is pretty apparent in their sound, and this sets them apart from the sea of pale Nirvana imitators currently clogging up the alternative scenes on both sides of the Atlantic.

The band is initially an interesting proposition, but listening to the pre-release of Eleventeen I am not completely convinced by them. Their use of noise somehow lacks the menace which the bands that clearly influenced them captured so disturbingly — it seems almost polished. After wondering what exactly it was about the album which failed to connect I came to the conclusion that there is a certain sense of contrivance about it which really reduces its impact.

Katie Jane flirts with some very obvious connotations of psychosis and innocence debased, and, like the kid at school who tries to get everyone's attention by pretending to be mad, there is something almost too obvious about it. (Titles on the album include "I Feel Insane" and "Everything About You is Weird.")

Listening to the album feels like you are having weirdness packaged for you, rather than experiencing the genuine article. This is kind of ironic since their first single, "Love Your Money," was an attack on the commericialism of the music business.

Of course this kind of criticism basically depends on what you look for in a band — if you really just want some energetic indie pop with noisy guitars and outrageous exhibitionism, then Daisy Chainsaw is fine, but their press release's rather pretentious comparisons between them and John Cage should be taken with a rather large grain of salt. Anyway, they're certainly a bit of different to the current generic norm in indie music, particularly in the U.S. scene, and are worth checking out at least. The album Eleventeen, is released this month, and the band is playing in Cambridge Monday night, for any intrepid concert goers who want to assess them first hand.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Take care of paperwork and other important tasks before you even think about going to lunch. Hidden hopes and desires will not come into being unless you share them with loved ones.

GEMINI (may 21-June 20): Do not overlook the obvious. A money matter must be handled by you personally. Do not procrastinate or try to shift the responsibility onto someone else.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be more adventuresome today. You are in good standing with friends and VIPs alike. You powerbase and circle of acquaintances continue to grow. Extend your reach.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): A wonderful new accord could touch your life. Develop even better rapport with your friends and associates; make introductions, too. Launch a special project.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Meeting privately with VIPs should be a highly enlightening experience. Learn as much as you can. Be more assertive on the financial front. Get any promises in writing.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You can expect to get a special business deal today. Your mind is keenly tuned to potential profits; a secret pact may result from confidential talks.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Stop thinking about the monotony of a task and you will get finished quicker. Shortcuts are favored so long as you don't skip any crucial steps. Coincide in a loved one.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Someone may try to persuade you to take a path you know is dangerous. Say "no" as many times as it takes for the message to sink in. Seek seclusion this evening.

Redskins, 5. Vikings.

With the win over the Chiefs, Dallas ranks 1st in the league. The terrible loss by Philly drops them behind San Francisco, and Washington is still trailing the Eagles, even though they beat them last week.

Now it's time for the much-anticipated 1992 All-Offensive Stud Team. We'll start off with our leader, at quarterback, Miami's Dan Marino. Super Dan doesn't put up Moon-like numbers, nor does he have the athleticism of Rocket Randall, but he gets the job done, giving the Dolphins an undefeated record, 6-0.

The backfield of this squad is loaded, and it is anchored by Dallas' Emmitt Smith and San Francisco's Ricky Watters. Emmitt is the cornerstone of the Cowboys franchise, and with all the deserved credit given to Barry Sanders and Thurman Thomas, he is having the most productive season thus far. Watters has been incredible this season for the 49ers, both running and catching the ball, giving us a formidable complement for Smith.

Coming off the bench to spell Smith and Watters is none other than the first ever Stud of the Week, Pittsburgh's Barry Foster. Remember that this prognosticator was the first to recognize the acheivements of the behemoth back out of the Steel City.

Our wideout corps begins with Lawrence Dawsey of the Bucs and Ernest Givens of Houston. Givens is a touchdown machine, tallying one in almost every game this season. Dawsey provides the big play, like another man out of Florida State.

Atlanta's Mike Pritchard is one of the few bright spots for the Falcons this year so far, becoming the go-to-guy for Chris Miller. He will catch the ball anywhere on the field, similar to the anchor of the offense, Dallas' Michael Irvin.

Irvin is both a deep threat and a possession receiver for the Cowboys. He is the man, and it would not surprise me if he gets a television commercial really soon.

Next week, we'll finish off the squad with defense and some mid-year report cards, but for now, off to the three big games of the weekend.

Don't look now, but guess who is re-emerging down in D.C. No, not George Bush, Mr. Morrissey, but the Washington Redskins, who travel to the 5-1 Vikings on Sunday. The Skins are coming off a huge win over the now second place Eagles. The Vikings can afford a loss, but Washington can't. Washington 20, Minnesota 10.

The number one ranked and first place Dallas Cowboys (I've been waiting to write that for six years) travel to the Raiders, who are on a roll as well. Troy Aikman responded immensely last week against the Chiefs, and this is another test for Jimmy Johnson's bunch before the showdown in Big D with the Eagles. Dallas 23, Los Angeles 21.

Jeff Reardon(e)'s fault

Shortly after reliever Jeff Reardon was traded from the Red Sox to the Braves for the rough equivalent of a jar of pond scum, the estimable Dan Shaughnessy of The Boston Globe wrote in his column how fortunate Reardon was to have escaped what Shaughnessy terms "Red Sox Nation." His change of venue was the envy of the other 23 suckers who would suffer through the last month of the dismal 1992 season in a Boston uniform.

Ted
KOTTLER

Most Sox fans know that the All-Ex-Red Sox Team is quite a formidable lineup. Dennis Eckersley, Brady Anderson, Jeff Bagwell, Curt Schilling, and Carney Lansford headline this squad. But unless they are also Braves fans, it has to please the faithful of the Old Towne Team that Reardon's performance in the World Series thus far is not about to bump the Eck back into the starting rotation for the All-Ex-Red Sox.

No, on the contrary, the bearded native of Dalton is well on his way to being remembered as one of the most gruesome goats in the 89-year history of the World Series.

Reardon's gaffes make me wonder how much communication occurs between he and Atlanta manager Bobby Cox. Knowing this would help determine who really deserves the blame here. Before putting him into pitch in the top of the 9th inning in Game 2, did Cox bother to ask Reardon a simple question, like, "So, Jeff, think you can throw just one past [future Hall of Famer] Ed Sprague tonight?"

If Reardon lied and said "Yeah," then Lord Jeff's the culprit. But if Cox actually had some genuine confidence in the way-past-his-prime holder of a frivolous record, who surrendered a game-winning solo homer to the slugging Sprague, then there should be no Manager of the Year award for Cox when the series is over.

Reardon has saved more games than any pitcher in major league history, though Lee Smith will likely catch him soon. He also blew more save opportunities in 1992 than any other reliever, which suggests that the spike-hanger beckons. But in fact, Reardon was probably all washed up five years ago, in 1987 with the Twins.

In that World Championship season, he allowed more than four runs per nine innings, a ghastly ERA. He languished for the next five seasons while Eckersley, Todd Worrell, Mitch Williams, and Bobby Thigpen stole the relief limelight from Reardon, Dan Quisenberry, and Bruce Sutter.

My point is this: When the Braves went in search of a closer as the trade deadline neared, they should have steered clear of the Red Sox and Reardon. True, the Braves didn't give up a thing to get him, but he is unworthy of being an ex-Red Sox.

Water polo home again

21-1 men face Army at Amherst College

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts water polo team, ranked 14th in the country, will play its last "home" game of the season this weekend as the Minutemen host two teams Saturday at Amherst College's Pratt Pool.

"I'll be looking to the seniors for leadership," said UMass coach Russ Yarworth. "We don't get to play at home too often. If there's a good crowd there I'm sure the intensity level will be up because they don't want to screw up in front of their friends.

"I'd love to see a good crowd of people seeing what essentially is one of the country's best teams playing a really exciting sport," he said.

The 21-1 Minutemen are riding an eye-catching 15-game winning streak, and should have little trouble adding tomorrow's noontime game against Army to their win total for the third time this season. They will also play the Boston-Metro team, comprised of former Boston-area college players, in preparation for next weekend's New England Championships at Brown University.

In the first weekend of the season UMass beat Army 11-7. Two weeks ago, in the Eastern League Tourney at Brown University, Umass won 12-3 in a laugher.

The Minutemen are coming off of last weekend's big wins over Harvard and Brown. The victory over the Crimson was of the come-from-behind variety, while UMass thoroughly outplayed the Bears in the team's biggest win of the year.

"As usual my goal is to have the team come in with a good attitude and control the game," said Yarworth. "It seems we've played a little bit better each weekend."

The Cadets have something big to play for this weekend as their hopes for a legitimate shot at the Eastern Championships in two weeks ride on a win over the Minutemen.

GAME NOTES - The seniors playing in their last home games are co-captains Scott Reed and Dan McOsker, Denny Kinne, Scott Deluca, and Jay Peluso.

games Thomas is the fourth leading scorer for Hartford despite his unscheduled vacation.

Other offensive stalwarts for Hartford include sophomore Tod Herskovitz (6 goals, 9 assists, 21 points), freshman Rob Jachym (8-1-17), and junior Flemming Kjoeller (5-5-15).

In between the pipes for the Hawks will probably be senior George Kostelis. Kostelis has started 61 games for the Hawks in his career, so it is safe to say he is known as a fixture down in Connecticut.

This year Kostelis has posted a tough 1.10 goals-against average. Hartford also has a more than capable backup in junior Neil Baverstock. Baverstock is 2-0 this year with a 1.29 goals against average.

As for UMass, they have their own playground legend in one Randy Jacobs. Lately Jacobs has made opposing defenses look like swiss cheese, amassing seven goals in his last three games. For the whole year Jacobs leads the team with thirteen goals on the year.

It was the UMass defense that was the most impressive facet of the game against UConn however. Goalie Mark Wolf faced minimum pressure against the Huskies, and when he did feel pressure he rose to the occasion, posting his third shutout on the year.

Of the Hartford battle, junior co-captain Todd Kylish was rearing to go.

"If we beat Hartford, we're right back on top of the region," he said. "We should be able to keep the intensity up through Sunday and into next week, and hopefully, ride a high wave to the tournament."

Biggest game of the year awaits football

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts football squad (4-1) has yet to be really tested so far this season.

That will change tomorrow at 1:30 p.m. when the Villanova Wildcats (5-1) travel to Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium to try and put a stop to the Minutemen's four-game game win streak.

The Wildcats were undefeated until last week, when they lost to Delaware in a squeaker, 21-20. Head coach Mike Hodges and company have already lost to Delaware this year and were hoping that Villanova could improve UMass' chances at first place.

"We were certainly cheering for Villanova, but that's the way it goes," said Hodges. "If we just continue to win like we've been doing, then we'll be all right."

The journey to victory number five will not be a particularly easy one, though, for UMass. Villanova boasts the most potent one-two quarterback combination in the Yankee Conference in Tom Columbo (5'7) and Brad Parpan (6'4) so the top-ranked UMass D will certainly have to be in top form. Columbo, a Brockton native, has thrown for 662 yards and seven TD's, while Parpan has thrown for 367 yards and three TD's.

"Their two QBs are as different as night and day," said Hodges. "One guy is small and scrambles around a lot and the other guy is big and has a cannon for an arm. It's very difficult to prepare for them."

UMass will also have to contend with fullback Jeff Johnson, who has run 77 times for 417 yards and one TD. Tight end Scott Donald (6'5, 220) is a force in the air as he has caught 21 passes for 267 yards and three TD's. That's an average per catch of 12.7.

UMass will have to bring out all its guns on offense tomorrow to counter the likes of 1991 YanCon Defensive Player-of-the-Year, and All-American senior linebacker Curtis Eller (6'0, 225) who has a whopping 73 tackles, third best in the conference. Eller has also recorded four sacks, has forced four fumbles and has broken up four passes.

Strong safety Devian Logan has 44 tackles and is third best in the YanCon in Kickoff returns with a 23.9 average. Defensive tackle Chris Grychowski has been impressive thus far this year with six QB sacks.

UMass will be led by the potent running attack (242 yds/game as a team) of tailbacks Rene Ingoglia (22-138, one TD, four receptions) and Johnny Johnson. Fullback Mike George turned an ankle last week against UConn and has been hobbling around all week with an inflatable cast. He may see limited action, but Ron Drapeau will definitely start at fullback. QB Andrew McNeilly will look to two of his favorite targets, flanker Eric Thimas and tight end Steve Dembowski in the air, and look for McNeilly to do a bit of scrambling as well. He will be protected by a huge offensive line, anchored by co-captain Bill Durkin (left guard) and center Andy LeBlanc.

Inside linebacker Phil Lartigue (56 tackles) and Scott Assencoa (five sacks last week) continue to impress on defense as does outside linebacker Mario Perry. Perry is one player who does not get cheated when he sacks a quarterback - you can feel those sacks up in the press box. Cornerback Don Caparotti and strong safety Matt Rajotte now lead the YanCon in interceptions with four in five games.

"Villanova's not gonna give us anything, so we've got to be very well prepared," said Hodges. "If we just take advantage of the opportunities that the defense has been giving us, then we'll do fine."

Minutemen Notes: The game can be heard on WTTT Amherst (1430 AM) with Mike Fagerson (play-by-play) and Jim Degnim (color).

Minutewomen defeat rival BU, improve to 15-1

CHRISTOPHER EVANS / COLLEGIAN

Ainslee Press scored her team leading 20th goal of the year Thursday, helping the UMass field hockey team squeak past Boston University 2-1 at Totman Field.

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team played their normal agressive style for about 40 minutes Thursday at Totman Field, which was just enough to hold off their rival, Boston University, 2-1.

The Minutewomen (15-1) scored two goals in a little more than five minutes just before and after the half, then held tough for the remaining 30 minutes to defeat a tenth ranked Terrier squad which would not quit.

Ainslee Press scored on a blast during a UMass penalty corner with a scant eight seconds remaining in the first period. In the second half, forward Tara Jelley put UMass up 2-0 by tenaciously banging home a loose ball in front of the open BU net. Jelley's goal ended the day for the UMass offense, which came out on fire but elected to sit on the 2-0 lead. The team's passive play cost them 10 minutes later.

The Terriers scored their lone goal on one of their two penalty corners. Jennifer Nixon inbounded the ball to Susie Maxwell, who was situated to UMass goalie Philippa Scott's right. Maxwell harmlessly pushed a weak shot near the net, but Scott did not react and let the ball roll into the net. This freakish goal cut the UMass lead to 2-1, and woke both teams up from their naps.

While BU went on the attack after the goal, UMass also seemed to wake up, at least defensively, and they contained the Terriers enough to preserve their fifth victory in a row.

The Minutewomen had a wealth of opportunities in the first half, but even the toughest shots were turned away by Terrier goalie Kerry Wingardner, who notched 21 saves. Three incredible saves occured on a Press rocket from outside the circle, another Press shot which was lifted on a penalty corner, and a Natalie Hart slapshot estimated at least 70 miles per hour, which Wingardner saved with her body.

"I thought [Wingardner] was outstanding," Press said. "She was definitely up for Women to face No. 3 UConn

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The last time the University of Massachusetts women's soccer team faced its rival the University of Connecticut, the Huskies ended the Minutewomen's 1991 season with a 1-0 victory in the NCAA tournament.

"This season an improved Massachusetts squad (12-2) will look to avenge that defeat as it travels to Storrs, Conn. Saturday for a rematch with third ranked UConn.

"this is our biggest game of the season," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "UConn may be the best team we face this year and we will have to play heads up to win."

Connecticut (14-1-1), whose only loss came against top ranked North Carolina, is currently No. 1 in New England. UConn is lead by speedster Denise Swenson, who has 10 goals on the season. Rudy will counter with sophomore midfielder Heidi Kocher.

"Heidi has done a nice job all season on the quick kids," Rudy said. "She is very efficient and a tough defender. She matches up well with Swenson."

No. 11 Massachusetts will have sweeper Lisa Mickelson back but leading scorer Kim Eynard (knee) is still questionable. Freshman Rachel LeDuc will start if Eyanrd can't play.

"We are still not sure about Eynard," Rudy said. "Even if she can come back she hasn't played in two weeks so I don't know what kind of shape she's in."

Rudy will start Briana Scurry (6-1) in net against UConn.

"Scurry is ready for a big game," Rudy said. "UConn beat her last year so she's motivated."

"The key to the game is if we can take the attack to UConn and not just play defense," Rudy said. "We are going to have to play our hearts out. I know we can do that. I know we will do that."

UMass entertains Elvis, UH

Attention Amherst: Elvis is coming, Elvis is coming.

No not rock legend Elvis Presley, but Elvis Thomas, sophomore forward for the University of Hartford men's soccer team. Thomas will bring his breathtaking skills to Garber Field on Sunday to take on the University of Massachusetts.

The Minutemen, ranked 7th in New England, will enter Sunday's game fresh off a 4-0 shellacking of UConn Wednesday. That victory gave the Minutemen (9-4-1) a three-game winning streak and tremendous momentum as well.

Hartford (9-4-2), ranked 2nd in New England, are currently riding a seven game unbeaten streak (5-0-2). The aforementioned Thomas, injured against Dartmouth early in the season, has returned with a vengeance.

In all five games he has played in this year, Thomas has scored. Impressive? Yes. With six goals in those five

Hispanic students list their demands

By SANDRA ROSE
Collegian Staff

Latino/a students at the University of Massachusetts Friday gave Chancellor Richard O'Brien two weeks to respond to a list of demands for them to re-open the Latin American Cultural Center.

The cultural center was closed last year by Latino/a students in conjunction with the closing of the United Asia Cultural Center by Asian students, to protest the inadequate commitment to multiculturalism at UMass, according to the press release.

The Latin American community held a meeting Thursday night to discuss the possibility of re-opening the cultural center, according to Nelson Acosta, director of the Office of Third World Affairs.

The consensus of the community was to re-open the cultural center and to challenge the University to fulfill its mission to create a multicultural environment for all students of color.

"We do not have sufficient funding to develop programs for the community," said Evelyn Rivera, ex-coordinator of the Latin American Cultural Center.

The Latino/a students are requesting:

- the relocation of the center from Moore House to a place that is more accessible to Latino/a students.
- an independent bank account in which the center has complete control over.
- adequate funding to develop programming and acquire equipment.
- to select the office to which the cultural center will report.

"We want to be a separate entity; to develop a center and programs to improve the quality of life for Latino/a students," said Ileana Ramos, vice-president of AHORA.

"These are reasonable demands. We want to work with you. We want negotiations before Nov. 5," David Nunez, chairperson of Third World Caucus, told O'Brien.

"We want to make it very clear that Latino/a students are organized and ready to take action."
– David Nunez, chairperson
Third World Caucus

"We want to make it very clear that [Latino/a] students are organized and ready to take action," Nunez said. "We support what all the other communities of color are doing, but we want to band together when we need to. We are a distinct community with our own distinct problems. There is a time to work together and a time to work on our own."

"I'll do my very best. I'll be glad to see the cultural centers open again. Cultural centers are valuable and important," Chancellor O'Brien said.

The Latin American Cultural Center is comparable to the Malcolm X Center in what it does for the African-American community, according to Nunez.

The Latin American Cultural Center will be a meeting place for Latino/a students to talk about issues and will act as a base of operations, Nunez said.

Administrators, students make 'progress'

By MICHELLE BAYLISS

Administrators and minority students are optimistic following their second negotiation session Saturday at the University of Massachusetts.

The students have agreed to extend their original two-week deadline, which would have ended with Saturday's meeting, until an agreement is reached.

Though "progress was made," one of the mediators at the session, Marty Walsh, regional director of the Justice Department's Community Relations Service said both parties acknowledged there is a lot of work left to be done. "We're very pleased and both parties are pleased," she said.

The demands include an increase in minority students, faculty and staff, an increase in scholarship aid and restoration of the Upward Bound program for high school students.

Student leaders and administrators have agreed to work out their differences in mediation sessions administered by the Central African election halted

By RAPHAEL KOPESSOUA
Associated Press

BANGUI, Central African Republic — The government halted voting in two cities Sunday in the country's first democratic presidential elections in 11 years. The opposition called for the cancellation of all balloting.

Security Minister Ismaela Nimaga said all voting in the capital, Bangui, the western city of Berberati, and among Central African expatriates in France, would be stopped because of election irregularities. He did not elaborate.

Voting continued elsewhere in the country, despite opposition requests to reschedule the entire election. Many in the former French colony of 3 million people had hoped Sunday's election would distance the country from the autocratic legacy of former Emperor Jean-Bedel Bokassao.

Three hours after the vote had begun, the only candidate who had been able to cast a ballot was the country's military leader, President Andre Kolingba.

Ballots were not available in the voting stations of the four other candidates.

"Because of the numerous irregularities observed, I am going to ask the Supreme Court to annul these elections," said former President David Dacko, who returned from exile to contest the election.

Other candidates voiced similar complaints.

Dacko became the Central African Republic's first president at independence from France in 1960. He named then-Col. Bokassa his military commander.

Bokassa overthrew Dacko in 1965, outlawed all opposition and clashed frequently with France, expelling its diplomats and businessmen and then inviting them back.

The mercurial leader crowned himself Emperor Bokassa I in 1977 in a ceremony patterned after Napoleon's coronation. After he ordered his army to fire on student demonstrators in 1979, France sent troops to restore Dacko to power while Bokassa was visiting Libya.

In 1987, Bokassa returned to Banguli where he was tried and convicted in the murders of 20 political opponents and for stealing millions in state funds.

U.S. suspends Somalian airlift

By G.G. LaBELLE
Associated Press

MOGADISHU, Somalia — An American plane delivering food to the starving in the central town of Baidoa was struck by a bullet Sunday, and the United States suspended its airlift.

An American spokesman said workers did not know who had fired on the cargo plane.

Relief agencies are caring for an estimated 80,000 people in Baidoa, which is among the towns hardest hit by Somalia's famine. However, relief officials say the situation has improved with increased deliveries of food, and the daily death toll has dropped from a high of 350 to 70.

Drought and war have killed more than 100,000 people in Somalia this year, and another 2 million are on the verge of starvation.

Clan warfare and banditry have periodically forced the suspension of international food airlifts, underscoring the difficulties relief workers face. As much as 200,000 tons of relief supplies delivered to Somalia this year has been looted.

It was the second time a U.S. plane was hit by gunfire since the Americans began their emergency airlift of food Aug. 21. Another C-130 was hit by a stray bullet Sept. 18 in the western town of Belet Huen, causing a two-week suspension of U.S. flights to that town.

In the last week, a German relief plane was hit by a bullet at Mogadishu's airport, and on Saturday two planes for the International Committee of the Red Cross were fired on in the southern port of Kismayu.

In Sunday's incident, the U.S. plane was making the second of 12 flights planned for Baidoa, said army Lt. Col. Robert Donnelly, the spokesman for the American operation, based in Kenya's coastal city of Mombasa.

Donnelly said the military C-130 Hercules was shot as it approached Baidoa's airstrip Sunday morning.

"One bullet hit the aircraft," said Donnelly, 43, of Suffern, N.Y. "We don't know how many shots were fired or where the bullet was fired from."

2,000 hike 10K to raise money for Jane Does

BOSTON (AP) — About 2,000 people hiked along the Charles River Sunday to raise money to fight domestic violence and support shelters for battered women.

The first Walk for Women's Safety raised about $200,000 in donations and pledges for the Jane Doe Safety Fund, spokeswoman Gillian Gansler said.

The fund, named after unknown abuse victims, supports more than 30 Massachusetts shelters for women and children.

"Any woman can be a Jane Doe," said Carolyn Ramsey, a former battered wife who established the fund.

"She is from any race, nationality, income level, or lifestyle," said Ramsey, executive director of the Massachusetts Coalition of Battered Women Service Groups. "Jane Doe can be your mother, sister, daughter or co-worker."

Despite the raw, damp day, the 10-kilometer event on Boston's Esplanade drew about twice as many participants as expected, including politicians, police officers, lawyers, union leaders and survivors of abuse.

Many marchers were members of teams from the Massachusetts Teachers Association, the Massachusetts Medical Society, Blue Cross-Blue Shield and other organizations and businesses.

Shawmut Bank and WBZ sponsored the event.

Along the route, participants passed 35 signs, each inscribed with the name of a victim of domestic violence. Thirty-five Massachusetts residents, mostly women and children, have been killed in such incidents this year.

Perot says 'dirty tricks' forced July withdrawal

NEW YORK (AP) — Ross Perot blames Bush campaign dirty tricks for forcing him to withdraw from the presidential race in July, the Texas billionaire says in interviews with CBS' "60 Minutes" and Sunday's Boston Herald.

But Bush campaign spokeswoman Torie Clarke called the allegations "total and complete nonsense."

Perot told both "60 Minutes" and the Herald that a well-connected Republican friend said the GOP had used computer imaging to doctor a photo of his daughter, Caroline. The CBS interview was to be broadcast Sunday evening.

"They were going to smear her with a fake photograph that they had done with a computer where you put a head on another body and they were acutally going to have people in the church to disrupt her wedding," Perot told the Herald, adding that the picture was to be given to supermarket tabloids.

The newspaper did not specify the content of the picture.

Perot also contends that the Bush campaign intended to wiretap his Dallas business office. He told the Herald that he has given FBI investigators a 20-minute videotape of a meeting in downtown Dallas between a senior member of the Bush campaign and an ex-CIA contract employee hired to do the wiring.

Perot provided no names to back up his allegations and would not say how he obtained the videotape. CBS says the head of the FBI's Dallas office found no evidence of wiretapping.

The Texas billionaire said he did not go public with the dirty tricks allegations when he withdrew from the race because he wanted to protect his daughter and didn't want to make it a campaign issue.

Perot said he didn't know how Caroline's Aug. 23 wedding might have been disrupted, but told the Herald: "Watch how they disrupt the rallies; watch how they tried to disrupt the Democratic convention. . . . They got a bunch of neo-Nazis there that do this kind of stuff."

He told the Herald that he did tell "a number of people" — including press secretary James Squires and all his family members except Caroline — the real reason he was leaving the race.

Perot told "60 Minutes" and the Herald that President Bush called him the day he dropped out to suggest a meeting. Perot said the meeting was canceled when he told the White House that his No. 1 item on the agenda would be dirty tricks.

CAMPUS SHORTS

compiled by David Massey

Be my neighbor

The colorful introductory pamphlet on UMass sent out by the Admissions Office to thousands of high school seniors utilizes an interesting euphemism to describe dorm life.

"Freshmen and sophomores are guaranteed on-campus housing in one of five 'neighborhoods.'"

If residence halls can be called neighborhoods, we should begin calling the time between classes "recess." And I personally advocate compulsory nap-time for all students on a daily basis.

Models 'R Us

Several flyers were seen around campus encouraging UMass women to sign up for a "Girls of UMass calendar." Emblazoned with several models displaying the latest swimwear, the ad offered a number for interested women to call. All calls to the company answering machine have yet to be returned. Watch out, Sports Illustrated.

Nightmares of Nostradamus

It appears that rumors last fall of a Halloween night massacre on campus was a one-shot hoax. UMass, in addition to many campuses across the Northeast, beefed up security last Halloween night in a residence hall in response to students' fear of a mass murder foretold by the French astrologer Nostradamus.

Many students in the Southwest residence halls were shaken by rumors of the alleged prophesy. According to campus lore, the 16th-century physician and prophet had predicted a murder in an L-shaped dorm on a hill near a pond, a cemetery and a certain building.

It's kind of a trivial prophesy to worry about, considering the famed seer predicts a major global catastrophe by the turn of the century.

Coming out in NoHo

The wonderful world of Northamptor. was featured in last Friday's Boston Globe and also on ABC's "20/20."

The Globe's Barbara Carton writes: "Today, Northampton's lesbian community has come of age. There is probably no other place in the United States where lesbians are so open, influential or established. More lesbians live in New York and San Francisco, or even Boston, but they are scattered, and their voices are diluted by the louder voices of gay men, so they do not give the impression of strength. To visit Northampton, therefore, is to see a social phenomenon that is unique."

More tuition troubles

State colleges and universities are cutting programs and faculty to hold the line on tuition hikes, according to a study released several weeks ago.

But the study says the price of tuition at state-run schools rose an average of 9.8 percent this year, more than twice the rate of inflation. The report was released by the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, which represents 375 public institutions and 30 state systems nationwide.

The total bill for an in-state UMass student, including tuition, fees, room and board is $8,755, an average increase of 3.6 percent. Will that be Visa or Mastercard?

Stink bombs and stuff

The owner of Joke City in Amherst, a mecca of inflatable chickens and exploding pens, is enjoying the rise in sales due to the upcoming Halloween holiday.

"We're selling a little bit of everything," said Jack Brooks, owner of the joke store located in the Amherst carriage shops. "We got all sorts of crazy stuff."

Brooks says a rubber mask of Bush is selling well although he doesn't carry a Clinton mask. But don't forget Ross "I'm all ears" Perot.

"Everybody's buying these jumbo ears as Perot ears," said Brooks.

Media said stereotyping Asians

By GEORGE ZHU
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Asians have been historically stereotyped by the general media in the United States, a Chinese American journalist told a group of students at Smith College Wednesday.

"The stereotype ranges from Charlie Chan, an emasculated Asian male character, the 'model minority' myth, to the so-called 'invasion of the U.S. by Japanese investors and members of the whole Asian mafia'," said Dolores Kong, a medical reporter for The Boston Globe.

Kong's speech, the third in a series of events celebrating the Asian Awareness Week, was sponsored by the Asian Student Association at Smith College.

Kong said she was outraged by a 1981 film named Hardly Working, in which Jerry Lewis portrayed a Japanese chef with stereotypic buck teeth, slant eyes and round glasses.

"The particular stereotype whether good or bad depends on economics," Kong said. "The media reflect the society and the society reflects the prevailed economic and political mood."

For instance, Kong said, as the United States "loses its international economic preeminence, the media and society at large turn to Japan-bashing, and consequently violence against Asian Americans increases and the stereotypes about Asian gangsters prevail."

In an earlier economic downturn about 10 years ago, a Chinese American in Detroit was killed by some White auto workers, who blamed people like him for the Japanese made automobiles that they felt affected their jobs, according to Kong.

"The auto workers never got sentenced, while Vincent Chin lost his life the night before he was to get married," Kong said. "This could be an example of stereotype that's very deadly."

Kong rejected the notion of the Japanese economic invasion, criticizing the media for "failing to mention how many more Europeans invest here than do Japanese."

While acknowledging Connie Chung's success in the broadcast media would make television stations more willing to hire Asians, Kong said, some Asian women "who don't look exotic enough or look Asian enough ended up being dismissed from either anchor positions or reporter jobs."

Chung, seemingly the best-known Chinese American broadcaster, is currently an anchor woman at CBS News.

"There are a population of Asian Americans on this campus who probably don't know much about their own culture and heritage," said Sandy Cheng, president of the Asian Student Association which has about 300 members. "The awareness week is a way for them to learn."

'Science Days' draw over 2,000 to University

Move over business and pre-law students — science majors are becoming the most populous group on campus, at least at the University of Massachusetts.

If you don't believe it, just ask one of the more than 2,000 high school juniors or seniors visiting the University's Amherst campus this month and the next for the second annual high school "Science Days," sponsored by the Faculty of Natural Sciences and Mathematics at UMass.

Why the interest? One reason may be the increase in students interested in pre-med, another might be the lure of the biotechnology industry, or an interest in environmental studies.

Whatever the motivation, students will be lining up for lectures with provocative titles like a "Trip to Absolute Zero," "Thunderstorms," and "Fire and Brimstone: the Eruption and Origin of Hawaiian Volcanoes." Each student will attend two morning lectures, and then be exposed to the world of college food with a luncheon invitation to a student dining hall.

In the afternoon, the future scientists will break into small groups for lab tours with distinguished faculty members who teach and do research in either biology, chemistry, computer science, earth science, mathematics or physics.

This is one of the largest organized student visits to the campus ever undertaken, according to Frederick W. Byron, Jr., dean of Natural Sciences and Mathematics on the Amherst campus, and one of the organizers of the event. Fifty-five schools will be taking part, 15 more than last year.

"One thing we learned last year is that a lot of high school students are interested in science," said Byron.

UM pundits plan election debate

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

The campus Democrats and the Republicans are getting ready for an election year showdown today at 12:30 p.m. in 168 Campus Center.

University Democrats' President Neil Carpenter and the Republican Club's former president Kevin Jourdain plan to debate the merits of their parties' candidates with the UMass Debate Union, as non-partisan moderators.

Jourdain said last night he felt "pretty confident" he would trounce the Democrat.

"This should be like taking candy from a baby," Jourdain said.

But Carpenter said he felt the debate favored the Republicans, because he said they had more of a decision in the planning of the debate. There will be a three minute response time with a two minute rebuttal. The forum will be open for audience questions at the end.

"I am doing this because I don't want us to look afraid to defend Clinton and Gore," Carpenter said. "I am hoping some people will come."

Jourdain said both he and Carpenter worked together in planning the debate.

"Pretty much a consensus. I was willing to debate in any format," Jourdain said. "I hope we get a good turn-out."

Although Carpenter said he is uneasy with the debate set-up, he is planning to focus on four main issues: abortion, the environment, education, and the economy.

"Let's get into [the issues] with some depth," Carpenter said.

Jourdain said he plans to look at Clinton's

Boston regional office of the U.S. Justice Department's Community Relations Service. The free service sponsored by the department provides conflict-resolution in racial disputes.

Since a recent assault on a Black resident assistant, which led to racial graffiti, threats and other incidents, students have been concerned about their safety.

"There was some progress but nothing materialized," said Fabiola Narcisse, president of the Black Student Union who attended the meeting. "We won't be satisfied until we see results. I think we're going in the right direction."

Negotiations are scheduled to continue this week according to Walsh. He said communication will take place between students and administrators through subcommittees which will be meeting this week in between formal sessions.

Due to negotiation ground rules, students and administrators present at the private meeting said they are unable to comment on the substance of the session.

Administrators at the meeting agreed progress was made and said they are hopeful it will continue in the same cordial atmosphere.

"The spirit of the meeting was very harmonious," said Chancellor Richard O'Brien. "I hope to continue to make progress and reach agreement in the next week or two."

"It was a good session," said Dean of Students Jo Anne Vanin. "People on all sides are working positively together and progress was made."

Walsh said mediators will be on campus during the coming week "in an effort to move progress forward more rapidly." In addition, campus officials said a subcommittee of students and administrators have been discussing methods to implement increased safety measures.

Doctor convicted of allowing use of AIDS-tainted blood

BROOKLINE, Mass. (AP) — A French doctor who faces a four-year prison sentence in his country for allowing the distribution of AIDS-contaminated blood maintained his silence Sunday morning.

A crowd of journalists continued waiting Sunday outside the graceful brick mansion where Dr. Michel Garretta has been living, but did not see or speak to Garretta. Others in the home refused to comment.

Garretta, former head of France's National Blood Transfusion Center, was one of three people convicted Friday in the scandal in which 1,200 hemophiliacs received tainted blood.

A woman or girl who answered the phone Sunday morning at Garretta's number in Brookline was asked whether a reporter could talk to Garretta. "I'm sorry. No, you can't," she said, hanging up.

After a second call, she said, "Excuse me, but we've got no comments" and hung up again.

At least 10 reporters, photographers, and television crew members, both from the United States and France, lingered at the vine-covered house with a slate mansard roof throughout Saturday.

The stakeout continued throughout a cold, damp Sunday.

On Sunday afternoon, Mark Krone of Brookline rodde up in front of the house, then taped two handmade signs — one facing the street, one facing the house — to a telephone pole.

Both signs read: "Shame."

"He should go home and face the responsiblity of what he did," said Krone, adding that he was not acting on behalf of any group.

"Someone should speak up for what this man did. It's murder and it's terrible," Krone said.

On Saturday afternoon, some journalists played catch as they waited for Garretta to appear. Some photogrphers said they saw a man they believed to be Garretta appear at a window early Saturday, but the house's shutters remained closed most of the day.

Xavier Charvet, Garretta's lawyer, told the Boston Globe Saturday that Garretta would return to France soon.

"We want them to see how science is done at a university, and we want to reassure their teachers that the sciences are alive and well at the University of Massachusetts."

As recent evidence of that assertion, Byron noted that UMass was recently awarded $1.2 million by the Howard Hughes Medical Institute to support its undergraduate bio-science program.

There are over 500 undergraduate biological science majors currently at the University. The Amherst campus also has the largest number of pre-medical students of any public university in New England, graduating between 75 and 90 each year. Approximately 75 percent of those graduates are accepted to medical school each year.

Further evidence of the university's progress in the sciences includes its selection last year as one of the "Ten Most Improved U.S. Universities in Science," by the Institute for Scientific Information in Philadelphia, a publisher of science texts.

UMass ranks 21st nationally in the production of science Ph.D.s, according to the National Research Council. In Massachusetts, only MIT and Harvard grant more doctorates in the sciences — 510 and 505 respectively.

Byron credits these achievements, and much of the success of Science Days, to the enthusiasm of the science faculty.

One such scientists is Robert Hallock, chairman of the physics department and a 1965 UMass graduate. Hallock was just awarded a Guggenheim Fellowship, and has spent many hours helping to organize the four-day event.

character, in addition to his lack of experience.

"He is just over his head. Bill Clinton just does not compare [to Bush]," Jourdain said. "The big issue is going to be experience."

Carpenter said he believes the Republican platform on abortion leaves "no room for trusting women anywhere." He said he disliked the president's stand on the environment along with his views on education. Carpenter said he agrees with Clinton's proposal to allow college students to pay off their loans through public service.

"[Bush] tried to cut Pell grants for families making $10,000 a year," Carpenter said.

But Jourdain said he finds Bush's platform in education and other social issues to be an asset.

"Bush is interested in capitalism and not in social hand-outs," Jourdain said.

Jourdain and Carpenter said the debate was originally going to be held at the Student Union Steps, but the Student Activities Office would not grant them the permission. Both said the Activities Office was afraid the debate would cause too much of a disturbance. Jourdain said they then planned to have the debate in the Student Union Ballroom, but they ran into a conflict with a theater group. As a result they decided to have the forum in the Campus Center.

Editorial/Opinion

Lip service isn't enough — we need to confront reality

Imagine being the victim of racial violence because of a simple thing such as the color of your skin. Imagine being constantly harassed because of your race. Imagine walking into a bathroom to find all kinds of racial slurs written on the wall. Have you ever been arrested for something you did not do, but because you are African-American and someone alleged you did something? No? Friends of mine on this campus have been.

Have you ever been stopped on campus for driving below the speed limit, or have you ever been stopped by three police cars and a security van and then searched? No? I have. This is only a veneer of what ALANA students have to put up with on this campus.

It has been a few weeks since the racial incidents on campus have occurred, but I am still irate and absolutely disgusted that such events have taken place. The people who took part in these actions have displayed what I would call very aberrant behavior. It is a cowardly thing when one takes part in such hateful actions but is not ready to take responsibility for these actions.

Those of you who have never experienced racial harassment or prejudice can never really feel what the ALANA students have felt over the last few weeks, until they themselves have actually been victims. Many White administrators, faculty and students say that they are sorry about the incidents which have occurred over the last few weeks, but can they really feel the pain? There are some who are allies to our cause, but then there are others who play a role. I think back to the rally in Southwest and ask where were all the White students who signed the banner condemning the racial incidents? What happened to those who witnessed the incident, but suddenly lost their memories?

It should not have to take students protesting to get the administration of this school to do a job they should have already been doing. In fact, if I was an administrator of this school I would be very embarrassed about the fact that it took a visit from President Hooker to do the job Chancellor O'Brien and his staff should have been doing. It leads me to question the competence and commitment of the administration to the ALANA community.

In a sense I feel sorry for those people who are racist, because they grew up learning how to hate from their parents, grandparents and environment. People of ALANA background cannot be racist because we don't hold the social economic power in this country, although we may feel anger which is provoked by racists. People who are racist, in my opinion, are people who carry a serious disease, who need psychological counseling.

Many people have played a role by taking an African-American class to study us and then say, "I am liberal and can understand the plight of Black people." Many went to hear Desmond Tutu speak, to make a political statement to say, "Yes, I was there," but let's not forget the true meaning of his visit.

Don't get me wrong, there are many White allies supporting the ALANA community who are true to the cause. They must try to help other White people to become educated to the plight of the ALANA community. What needs to be looked at is the history of racism in this country which is always eschewed in the classrooms. When one can admit there is a problem and actually look in the mirror, we will be able to make progress. An alcoholic cannot be cured until he or she can admit to themselves that a problem exists. Some people have to look a little deeper into their hearts, but I am sure somewhere down there one can come to terms with reality.

Math major tells Barbie to shut up

I am a woman, I am a mathematics major, and I find fault with a toy that tells young girls "math class is tough" [Collegian, Oct. 21]. I certainly do not claim that after playing with Teen Talk Barbie third grade girls everywhere will bring home failing grades in math class. No, Barbie's effect is much less direct and therefore more easily ignored.

I have taken 13 math classes at UMass. Women were outnumbered in all of them. I had a professor who refused to call on women in class. I've been treated as intellectually inferior. I've been told by a man, "Women don't belong in math classes." The work I do must be twice as good as a man's to earn half the respect. Some will never notice my work no matter how good it is because I am a woman and "everyone knows women aren't good at math." I want to explode that myth. I am a woman and I am good at math.

Society conditions children to accept traditional sex roles. They learn their expected place in life from TV, magazines, relatives, teachers and the toys they are given. Children learn that math "should" be difficult for girls, and that girls should study other subjects. Hearing Barbie croak out, "Math class is tough," day after day reinforces the idea that American culture is already cramming down their throats: girls aren't good at math. I understand that Teen Talk Barbie may seem like a small issue, but if we do not actively fight gender stereotypes we condone them.

Men, not just women, find math class tough

While I'm not generally one to give a damn what a talking Barbie would have to say, I am firmly against one that would relay the message "Math class is tough" to young girls. While Mark Wenham [Collegian, Oct. 21] expressed that he supports women's equality, he went on to say there is no harm in the new talking doll. "There are bigger fish to fry," he says. I disagree. In order for women to achieve the equality they are entitled to, every offense must be treated with severity.

Women are already under represented in math and science classes. As a mechanical engineer, nearly every person in my classes is male. I believe the few women in my classes have it much harder than the men. I frequently hear the "men" in my classes stereotype the women as masculine or hard-work geeks. They assume a connection between scientific ability and masculinity.

What Barbie says is sometimes true. Math class is tough, even for a White male like myself. However, the doll targets a certain group: easily influenced young girls, already subjected to discrimination in the sciences. With a friendly companion like Barbie telling them math is hard, the stereotype of math being a man's field is reinforced. No one has to tell young girls that they will not excel in math. It is the small, daily influences that make the message perfectly clear: women cannot expect to succeed in the field of mathematics. If pulling Barbie off the shelf will remove just one of these influences, it is important.

Misery on a Sunday morn

This is a true story. Sunday morning: things are not going well. It was an inauspicious start anyway; returning from a weekend in Vermont, the campus looked grim. We're all used to bad architecture, but so much of it all at once is dispiriting. UMass, especially compared to the wooden houses of Vermont which seems in their very construction to accept their transitory nature.

Jesse
ARMSTRONG

Anyway, for once I thought I'd get my column in early. . . get it written up and typed well before the 3 p.m. deadline. Rolling a few choice phrases around my head in the shower, the day is looking up. But (the horror, the horror) where is my key? Locked, of course, safely in my room with, amongst other things, my clothes and my notes for this column.

Dripping and shivering I wander the Sunday-gray, empty-wrecked corridors of Butterfield, looking for somebody to lend me some trousers to make the icy run to the cluster office. It is a sad fate that the only male awake is a gibbering lunatic in the basement. He offers me the dregs of a bottle of peppermint schnapps; he's been up all night, waiting to go to a Unitarian church service where he tried to steal a hymn book. He is only too glad to furnish me with clothes: huge, oversized Timberland boots, flannel plaid jogging pants and a different plaid horse-hair-feeling shirt.

Looking like a Scotsman's bad trip I dash to the cluster office, shampoo in hand, but it's closed till 2. I am condemned, condemned to linger like a bad smell in my day-glo clashing tartans in the dining commons, putting people off their breakfasts until either the cluster office opens or my roommate returns.

There is a sad epilogue to this story. It is me, frustrated and tired and aware of the time ticking away to the 3 p.m. column deadline, trying to break into my room. There is a method I'm told, but all I succeed in doing as I snap my leg down onto my door handle is to rip the heel off one of the borrowed Timberland boots. Pathos. Or maybe bathos as I wander, heel dragging, plaid nightmare, around the dorm looking for someone awake who'll let me record my misfortunes on their word processor.

And this is all I remember of my notes for a column, a reply to those who disagreed with my comments last week on American football. The difference between what I will grudgingly, while on this continent, call soccer and football is like the difference between good sex and bad sex. Soccer is made up of long, flowing, teasing moves, skillful yet spontaneous and healthily physical. Football, meanwhile, is interrupted, over-tactical, unspontaneous, brutal. Spectators are pushed into fake elation at touchdown from relief that anything at all has been achieved.

Please, gentle readers, take pity on any plaid-clad idiots you encounter: you never know when it might be you in the corridor.

This column is dedicated to Fran for the trousers and Kevin for the word processor. Without you none of this would have been possible.

GEO gives support to protestors, demands

As representatives of the Graduate Employee Organization, we add our voices to those who have expressed outrage at incidents of racially motivated violence on campus. These incidents must be seen in the context of a history of such incidents and must be understood as symptoms of deeper problems the University community has yet to come to terms with. The administration's response has typically been to calm things down, protect its public image and apply band-aid programs and unfulfilled proposals for programs while refusing to deal with root causes.

We support actions taken by students at the Washington Tower vigil and protest, as well as at the Memorial Hall sit-in, in bringing attention to the seriousness and urgency of addressing the causes of racism and violence. We endorse the Memorandum of Demands put forward by the ALANA students. While supporting the program demands, we see as particularly significant the demands calling for greater minority student participation in decision-making processes. These are essential for the long term commitment and involvement needed to deal with issues; they address questions of structural hierarchy and power differentials at the University that reinforce institutional oppression rather than redress it. We hope the administration has the foresight to agree to all the demands and to help create viable structures on campus to continue work resolving these problems.

We support the students who occupied Memorial Hall. Their actions should be judged on the morality rather than the legality of what they did. We would consider disciplinary action taken against any one of them as an injury to us and the entire university and will respond accordingly.

Prof urges increased hiring of faculty of color

Dear Chancellor O'Brien:

I am writing to you to request that, of the 100 new faculty positions made available on this campus, 50 percent be earmarked for people of color. I am also requesting that Provost Glen Gordon revise his restructuring plan to include a campus that is multicultural at every level.

I am also requesting that, in consultation with department heads and chairs, the deans reconsider the positions allocated to them and give priority to those areas where the hiring of minority faculty will be most likely. I have already urged my own dean and department head to reallocate the position given to my own department to an area where it will be possible to hire a minority faculty member. This proposal is a step towards implementing ALANA students' demand for the hiring of increased numbers of faculty of color.

I've been running around like an (insert appropriate simile here) all weekend, and am not done yet, so I thought I'd save some time this column and cover a couple of pieces that are shorter than my usual fare.

First up is a book by New York artist Peter Kuper — you might recognize him from some of the Op-Ed illustrations he does for the New York Times. His cartooning is very expressive, yet at times manages to achieve a high degree of stylization, almost like a restrained Cubist, and he works quite often with such off-the-wall techniques as stencils and scratchboard.

Comics Trips is a compilation of sketchbook pages from his eight-month-long trip around the Third World in 1989, and as such is something of a grab bag.

There are a lot of pages which have collages of sketched images from his trip, mostly in pen-and-ink and wash. He works frequently with found images such as stamps and bits of maps, incorporating them into the drawings as starting points.

The real strength of the book are the three comics stories scattered throughout — "Black Market," "Gorillas," and "Bangkok," which are extended anecdotes about memorable moments on the trip.

Of the three, "Gorillas" is definitely the best, outlining the sometimes unbelievable obstacles in trying to get to see the gorillas in the Kinigi National Park in Rwanda.

My problem with Comics Trips is that I don't believe that I can recommend that you buy it. Kuper is always a delight to read, and the book is great to flip through, but it is slim, clocking in at 64 pages, mostly sketches and illustrations.

It suffers from the same syndrome as most Tundra books — in their eagerness to showcase the work they publish in the best possible light, they quite often price their books out of the reach of most people. Seven dollars is really too much for this comic.

Next is a curious little comic called The Dreams of Everyman, by Joe Lee. The title pretty much says it all. Our Hero is Everyman, that "consort of God and Devil, Virtue and Vice, that Star of Mystery Play and Morality Tale," a dumpy little bald White guy in a suit who dreams.

I'm not quite certain why I liked this comic so much. The dreams are often quite didactic, making very obvious points — but they are always handled with wit and a certain deflatory attitude to Everyman's aspirations and misconceptions.

The language often has a delightfully old-fashioned feel to it, reminding me of Winsor McCay, an old master of comics who was also famous for his work about dreams.

The drawing is gorgeous, using a sumptuous mix of cross hatching and pointillism to make his fleshy hero and the world he moves through weighty and solid.

Kuper's cartooning is very expressive, yet at times manages to achieve a high degree of stylization, almost like a restrained Cubist

But I think my favorite thing about Dreams was the last story, a perfect retelling of the old Buddhist tale about the cliff, those two tigers, and that strawberry.

Lee is definitely working in the tradition of the old underground comics from the Seventies, like many alternative comics artists today.

But he's drawing more from the mystical side rather than the political. This philosophy and, yes, dreaminess is something that so far has been missing from the alternative comics of the '90s. He'll be someone to watch.

Coming Into Passion: a one-woman wonder

By SHAWN MCDONNELL
Collegian staff

Jude Narita has described her one-woman show, Coming Into Passion (performed Friday at Bowker Auditorium), as containing "the voices which are missing from American theatre." It would be difficult to argue that point. One need only look back at some of the great Asian performers on stage and screen in recent years (Monique Wilson, Alec Mapa, or Tamlyn Tomita to name a few) to realize that none of them have found significant work since their one-in-a-million lucky breaks.

That an Asian artist could overcome significant barriers to create a widely popular show is remarkable in itself. What is more remarkable is that Coming Into Passion manages to expertly avoid the dangers of a politically-based single-performer show. Passion is not a vanity production, and neither is it a show which screams politics while alienating its audience. What Narita has achieved is a remarkably moving story of race, change, growth, and understanding; an epic tale told in simple, unpretentious words.

Narita assumes seven roles in the show, ranging from a Japanese child witnessing the destruction of Hiroshima to a third generation Asian-American revolting against her heritage. The characters are of different worlds, different times, different positions, yet there is a strong sense of inter-relatedness between them.

Narita is a sensitive and insightful writer, who seems capable of finding the humanity in everything and everybody without passing any judgments. A Vietnamese prostitute is ecstatic to have regular customers, because it means her family will have food. This, says Narita, is noble. Yet equally noble is the Cambodian refugee who regrets surviving a Khmer Rouge massacre because she was forced to see so many die.

In the most upsetting piece, a child fleeing the destruction of Hiroshima turns to embrace death, because she is simply tired of running.

Narita is also a rarely gifted actress, able to drastically change her voice, appearance, and mannerisms to suit the needs of her characters. Yet, unlike many other character monologists, her world is not unremittingly dark, nor her characters fundamentally evil. Eric Bogosian might want to reveal his subjects, but Narita tries only to embrace hers. Passion is less about hardship and suffering than it is about the people who deal with that hardship and suffering.

The character pieces do not follow one another in any distinguishable pattern. Chronology, place, impact and mood are juggled quite effectively, and the result is a constant series of shocks and surprises. Under the direction of Colin Cox, the evening is fast-paced and visually striking.

Narita's only mistake is her attempt to pull all the pieces neatly together with a rather pedestrian frame device. An Asian-American woman rationalizes her lack of connection to her heritage ("I'm not Asian, I'm American"), then dreams the rest of the show.

This entire frame seems like an afterthought, and by lumping together all six of the other characters with a silly "we're all in it together" moral, Narita risks undermining the effects of her otherwise open-ended character sketches.

However, if this simplistic device is a flaw, it does not make the jewel less impressive. Coming Into Passion is a remarkable offering from a vastly talented young writer/performer, which manages to entertain while saying something significant, and a bit reassuring, about the disturbing times we live in.

The next big college band?

Gin Blossoms hold their own on new Experience

By SHARON MURPHY
Collegian Correspondent

New Miserable Experience
Gin Blossoms
A & M Records

The '90s are now upon us and the search is on for the next great college band. The Gin Blossoms are definitely headed in that direction. The Arizona-based band, likened to R.E.M., lives up to that expectation on their new album New Miserable Experience.

With guitarist-vocalist Robin Wilson, guitarist-vocalist Jesse Vanenzuila, bassist Bill Leen and drummer Phillip Rhodes, the Gin Blossoms come through with a sound that holds its own through the album.

Kicking off with "Lost Horizons," the band quickly comes across with a tough attitude that rings through the guitars in the background. That attitude carries on throughout the album on tracks like "Mrs. Rita" and "Hold Me Down."

The first single, "Hey Jealousy" has an intensity that grabs the listener and does not let go at all through the nonsense. The blend of the vocals and music work to string the songs together and make up a fable-like story, even though the lyrics don't always make sense.

Comparisons to R.E.M. are inevitable. The Gin Blossoms' harmonies are reminiscent of the Michael Stipe-led band, though the vocals are far clearer than Stipe would ever sing, even now. In addition, the topics of the songs seem more inspired by 10,000 Maniacs than R.E.M., with the poetic narratives less direct.

The Gin Blossoms use New Miserable Experience to forge their way through the mainstream without giving into it, while at the same time avoiding the protection of the alternative music scene. There are reminders of the '80s foundation of first generation college bands in Gin Blossoms, and with it the hope that the '90s will continue the tradition of great college bands.

Sit-down thrills with the Throwing Muses

By ROLAND COGGIN
Collegian Staff

When the Throwing Muses played at the Iron Horse Tuesday night, a lot of young rock and rollers got to see music the middle-aged way: with dinner, sitting down. It was a nice change of pace and an excellent show that was easy to enjoy.

The original opener Flaming Lips canceled and were replaced by Oat Pearl, who showed why they've been called one of the Valley's finest. But they'll have to lose their female vocalist who looked like the winner of a "party with Pearl Jam" contest. Her pseudo go-go dancing and lame attempts at looking busy in songs she didn't sing were more suited for karoake night at a sports bar.

The rest of the band sounded great, and I think they must have written a lot of their songs in autumn, because their mood really fit the weather outside. It was almost comical to see them playing to a sea of candlelit tables of people, though I'm used to dodging vicious people's elbows when seeing a band like Oat Pearl. Instead, I sipped coffee and smiled at the irony.

The Throwing Muses came on as a trio that could have been called the Kristen Hersh band. With Tanya Donelly gone, she carries the Muses herself, as she has always been talented enough to do so.

They opened with Hendrix's "Manic Depression" as a sort of showcase for Kristen's "other two," who are probably the best Throwing Muses rythm section ever. The drummer (who I think was the Muses' original) played like a young marching band drummer who is mad at his parents and trying to let them know it.

It almost seemed that Kristen Hersh's charisma demanded such intensity, and no matter how hard he played, he couldn't overshadow her. The bassist was the groove in the backround kind of guy who rounded out one of the hugest sounds around.

Kristen Hersh sang over the ground shaking beats without the slightest sign of strain on her face; her lips barely moved, but her voice filled the room like a whole choir. My friends and I agreed that we could listen to her all day, and we now all aspire to be as cool as she is.

Hersh's guitar playing was beautiful too, and she has a style like no one else's. Until recently, women lead guitarists were rare, but now of the dozens around, she is by far the best I've seen. Her solos had the same kind of character that separates her voice from other singers, and she effortlessly kept up with the speedy rythm section.

The Muses played songs from all of their albums (except the ones that Tanya Donelly wrote) and were able to convey the emotion with a less eccentric style. Kristen Hersh was nothing less than incredible and she was so captivating that she kept people's wide-eyed stares even as she tuned her guitar between songs.

This lineup is one that can bring the Muses popularity while staying true to an original sound that in the past was too far ahead of its time for most people to appreciate.

For me, seeing the Throwing Muses was like having a really good dream — it's so beautiful it's hard to grasp, no matter how hard you try — and when it's over all you know is you want to have that dream again.

Luckily, with the Muses there are a couple of great albums to listen to, and their latest, Red Heaven will keep Kristen Hersh's voice echoing through your head even in the daytime.

job, they ran all over us."

Although the Huskies dominated the play in the first half, their goal came as a result of a tremendous individual effort.

Swenson, UConn's leading scorer, picked up a loose ball 35 yards out on the right side. From there she drilled the ball into the upper left corner of the net and just past the leap of UMass goal keeper Briana Scurry.

"Swenson really cranked it, it was a great goal," Rudy said. "She made the play count."

UMass (12-3) could not mount much of a counterattack in the first but Scurry held them close with a strong effort, highlighted by the denial of Pam Claudio on a penalty shot.

After the Swenson goal, Rudy took out his freshman front line and replaced them with Kim Eynard, Colleen Milliken and Skye Eddy. Eynard, the team's leading scorer, had been questionable to play due to a knee injury, likewise for Milliken (ankle), and Eddy is usually a goalkeeper.

"I felt we needed some experience," Rudy said. "Kim seemed to have recovered miraculously and Skye just played great."

The result was a renewed Massachusetts attack, which produced several scoring opportunities.

Eynard drove down the right side and unleashed a drive from 20 yards out which struck the left post. Later in the second half, off of an indirect kick, the ball was served to the right side of the net to Eynard. UConn keeper Amy Schwarz fell down, leaving most of the net open, but Eynard headed the ball down and it hit Schwarz, who was laying on the goal line.

In the 70th minute Eddy broke in alone and scored on Schwarz but Milliken was called offside.

"We got our chances but we couldn't put them in," Rudy said. "It's disappointing we didn't play a better first half, but we didn't quit and we almost had them."

one past Minuteman goalie Mark Wolf.

The 1-0 lead for the Hawks would not last long though as UMass roared back to tie the score 2:13 later (28:32 into the game). Junior Todd Kylish took a nice drop pass from junior Randy Jacobs and directed the ball past Hartford goalie George Kostelis.

The rest of the first half saw a couple of opportunities for both teams, the best being UMass' Jacobs getting denied by Kostelis on a screamer at the 30:43 mark.

In the second half, it was more of the same. Both teams played well and had opportunities but couldn't quite capitalize.

That would all change at the 60:31 mark when the Minutemen took advantage of a botched clear by Hartford. Junior Justin Edelman got the ball at the front of the Hawk box as it caromed off Jacobs' back and fed it to freshman Colin Johnson. From there Johnson made it elementary, slipping the ball past Kostelis.

With the score now 2-1 UMass, the game continued to see-saw back and forth. Finally 71:18 into the game, Hartford would tie it off of a free kick. Senior Chris Love netted the ball to make it a 2-2 game.

Both teams continued to fight fiercely but were denied. After two overtimes, in which many a post was hit (by UMass) and big saves were made (by both goalies) the game ended in a 2-2 tie.

controlled the game, after they scored I was hoping we'd get a couple of more chances."

UMass did get a chance on a penalty corner with 12 minutes left, and defenseman Natalie Hart's stinging slapshot deflected off UConn goalie Tina Moon and into the net, giving the Minutewomen the 2-1 victory.

"She cranked it," said Hixon. "She just pasted it, it hit the goalie's leg guard and went in the net. I'm surprised the shot didn't knock [Moon] into the net."

When asked how fast the 6-foot-3 Hart could shoot, Hixon replied, "I really don't know. The number they've been throwing around is 70 miles per hour, but I'd have to have a radar gun to be sure."

The Minutewomen outshot the Huskies 28-10 and had a 11-2 edge on penalty corners. With both Hart's and Press' goals coming on penalty corners, the offensive weapon which plagued the team last year seems to be one of their strengths this season.

"Last year we were really groping for a corner piece that would work. Our personnel were relatively inexperienced and we didn't have as powerful hitters," Hixon said.

"This year, the players at the various skills are all experienced," she said. Jenn Salisbury has really worked hard, she's been absolutely fantastic, and with Ainslee, Natalie and Joy [Blenis], we're threatening because we aren't just one dimensional."

A loss to the unranked Huskies might have knocked UMass out of the No. 4 position they have occupied for three weeks and hurt them in the New England rankings. By winning, UMass has stayed on top in the region and will likely coast into the Atlantic 10 Championships relatively unharmed.

Minutemen upset No. 8 Villanova, 13-9

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts football team was picked to finish near the bottom of the Yankee Conference this season, and even after winning four of their first five games many still had doubts about the ability of this team.

But yesterday the Minutemen proved all doubters wrong, as they trudged through the mud and rain in front of 6,891 enthusiastic fans for a 13-9 victory over nationally ranked Villanova.

"Going into the game, a lot of people didn't believe in us and said the teams we had played had a total of five wins between them," said cornerback Don Caparotti. "But after beating a team like Villanova (5-1 before the game) people are going to have to respect us."

Villanova led for most of the game but at the 14:54 mark of the fourth quarter, down 9-6, tailback Rene Ingoglia (21-51 yds, two TD's) took a pitch from quarterback Andrew McNeilly and ran four yards into the right corner of the end zone for the go-ahead touchdown. It looked as if McNeilly was going to be dropped for a loss on third-and-four as he ran right but just as he was hit, he pitched the ball to the streaking Ingoglia, who followed some great blocking into the end zone for the game-winning TD.

"I waited until the last possible second to pitch the ball," said McNeilly, who completed 6 of 11 pass attempts for 86 yards. "As I was going down, I saw Rene from the corner of my eye and pitched off to him."

On the first play of the game, McNeilly dropped back to pass on first down, and hit split end Matt Read for a 43-yard gain. Three plays later, Ingoglia ran eight yards around left tackle for a 6-0 Minutemen lead (the two-point conversion was no good).

"It's unbelievable that on the first play of the game, they'd have a play action pass," said a disconsolate head coach Andy Talley. "All week before the game, we told the kids to watch out for the run because they can't pass the ball and then their guy runs right by our cornerback for a 43-yard gain."

Villanova's first points came when, with UMass pinned on their own five yard line facing a third down and 12, McNeilly slipped in the end zone and was sacked by inside linebacker Mike Jones for a safety and a very baseball-like score of 6-2.

In the second quarter, after three Massachusetts penalties, Villanova QB Tom Columbo hit flanker Harold Hart for a 35-yard gain. Six plays later, Hart out-leaped Caparotti to catch Columbo's lame-duck pass. 9-6 'Nova.

"There's nothing you can do about a play like that," said Caparotti. "Coach Hodges kept my head up and told me to forget about it."

Villanova had some golden opportunities to score throughout the game, but the UMass defense held tough. Perhaps the biggest play was when, on fourth-and-fifteen, Columbo lofted a pass into the left corner of the end zone, but cornerback Tony Williams was there to deflect the pass. Williams played a great game all-around as he had six tackles, including one of Villanova punter William Hoffman after he fumbled the snap. Outside linebacker Mario Perry had a solid game as well, as he compiled 10 tackles, 2.5 sacks, and caused two fumbles.

"This was the second week in a row that we got screwed by the referees," said Talley, referring to the disallowed TD in the fourth quarter. "Not to take anything away from UMass, but we don't work our butts off all week to have the game decided on a bad call like that." Hodges had no comment regarding the referees.

"The bottom line is that we got the job done," said McNeilly. "We scored more points then they did."

Game Notes: Villanova Coach Andy Talley on the lousy field conditions: "The field conditions were bad enough to begin with and then they put 32 bands on at halftime. I'm sure that really helped our situation."

Minutemen look to silence critics

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

During the pre-season, the skeptics said University of Massachusetts football was dead.

At mid-season with the Minutemen sporting a 4-1 record, the skeptics said that UMass wasn't for real, and that their early season schedule bordered on the weak side.

Saturday, UMass proved the skeptics wrong by defeating a heavily favored Villanova squad 13-9 on a rain and mud-soaked McGuirk Alumni Stadium field that was oddly reminiscent of 1990's 3-0 mud bowl between these two old rivals.

"All this year, people have been saying that the teams we've played have won like five games," said UMass cornerback Don Caparotti. "Now this [victory over Villanova] just opens the door to make people believe in us."

Believe in them people should, as the Minutemen held the potent Wildcat offense (375.8 yards per game) to just 225 yards while thrice squelching 'Nova scoring drives inside the UMass 20 yard line.

And while the UMass offensive attack may not have been the prettiest thing ever seen in these parts, Rene Ingoglia's four-yard touchdown jaunt seconds into the fourth quarter put UMass up for good, as the Minutemen recorded their biggest victory of the '92 campaign.

"We played our hearts out today," said UMass outside linebacker Mario Perry. "It was a total team effort, and our season is just beginning."

The Minutemen have now rattled off five victories in a row after their season opening loss to Delaware, and this victory over Villanova (ranked eighth in last week's NCAA Division 1-AA poll) should vault the team into the top 20 for the first time since last season's brief pre-season appearance.

"We're playing better every week," said UMass head coach Mike Hodges. "It comes down to your personnel, and our kids got it done today."

"We took advantage of Villanova's mistakes," said Hodges. "We talked about taking advantage of our opportunities at halftime, and we came out in the second half and did it."

By taking advantage of Villanova's mistakes and escaping with the 13-9 win, the Minutemen have now moved into a second place tie with Richmond, while keeping their Yankee Conference title and post-season hopes alive.

"We just have to go into every game like we did this one," Caparotti said. "We beat Villanova, and people are going to have to respect us now."

For the UMass football family, it is respect that is long overdue after an offseason in which many questioned the unity and character of this team.

"The coach kept telling us early in the season that we're not a family yet," said Perry. "Well, we're cousins now."

Soccer falls short versus UConn, 1-0

By DAN WETZEL

The University of Connecticut women's soccer team made Denise Swenson's goal in the 20th-minute stand as it held off a frenzied University of Massachusetts attack in the second half for a 1-0 victory.

Massachusetts, ranked No. 11 nationally, played an inspired second half only to come up short on a number of fine scoring bids.

"We deserved a better fate, we played well enough to win," UMass coach Jim Rudy said. "We put in a nice second half, we dominated it. We had our chances to win it and we didn't come through."

Unfortunately for UMass, it did not perform in the first half and the Huskies (15-1-1) were able to capitalize.

"We just let them play in the first," Rudy said. "We did not do the

UM, Hartford battle, end in 2-2 deadlock

Usually, in boxing matches the two opponents take a few rounds to feel each other out before bombing away. On Sunday at Garber Field the same thing could be said for the University of Massachusetts and University of Hartford men's soccer teams.

After a quiet opening 25 minutes, the two teams exchanged blows before settling for a 2-2 tie. Both teams, but especially UMass (9-4-2), had opportunities to win the game, but lady luck would not play her hand for either team.

Hartford (10-4-2) would get on the board first, 26:19 into the game. Freshman Rob Jachym collected a pass from senior Chris Williams and blasted

Field hockey defeats UConn for sixth in row

Countdown to postseason: T-minus two games and counting.

The University of Massachusetts field hockey team rolled into Storrs, Conn. Saturday to face a mediocre University of Connecticut team and rolled out with a 2-1 win. The Minutewomen outplayed the Huskies (6-9-1) throughout in a tune up for the postseason.

UMass (16-1) had not much to gain with their sixth victory in a row, but plenty to lose. It appeared that an upset was looming when UConn's Patsy Rinehimer tied the game at 1 on a penalty corner with only 15 minutes left in regulation. UMass, which had plenty of excellent scoring opportunities, could get only one goal in the first half on an Ainslee Press penalty corner.

"I honestly think we should've definitely had one or two more goals," said UMass head coach Pam Hixon. "We

AIDS scandal's French doctor heading home

BROOKLINE (AP) — The former head of France's National Blood Transfusion Center, convicted of infecting 1,200 hemophiliacs with AIDS-tainted blood, will return to Paris within days, his attorney said.

Dr. Michael Garretta was sentenced Friday to four years in prison and a $100,000 fine. Two other former health officials also were convicted in the scandal.

Garretta's lawyer, Xavier Charvet, said Monday that his client's accusers were exaggerating the number of victims in the case and "creating hysteria." Charvet said Garretta was innocent, and would say so himself before he left for France.

"The people who write these lies and accept them, they should be ashamed of what it is that they've done," Charvet said in a press conference conducted mostly in French on the front steps of his client's rented Brookline home.

Charvet said that Garretta would return to France on Tuesday or Wednesday.

Asked if the doctor was guilty, Charvet said, "No, not at all." But he later added that Garretta has not decided whether to appeal.

"It's too difficult," Charvet said. "I don't know yet."

Charvet condemned the French newspaper France Ce Soir for listing Garretta's home telephone number, saying the media had behaved "scandalously" and that no one had listened to his client's side of the story.

He said Garretta was being made a scapegoat, a reference to complaints that former Premier Laurent Fabius and two of his ministers were not charged in the scandal.

Garretta did not respond to requests that he speak personally to the 15 French and American reporters and photographers who have been staking out his vine covered brick house since Saturday.

Athletes aided in academics

Student tutors pull teammates through tough times

By RACHEL MILLER
Collegian Correspondent

Scott Kaplowitz, a sophomore undeclared major and defensive back for the University of Massachusetts football team, starts his day early, squeezing in all his classes before 2 p.m. Then he is off to the practice field for five hours, followed by dinner with the team until 7:30 p.m.

But do not think his academics take a back seat in this hectic schedule.

This year Kaplowitz and about 750 other student athletes at the University of Massachusetts have a new tutoring program available to them through the Athletic Department.

After his daily regimen, Kaplowitz tries to devote his evenings to academics. As a freshman he spent evenings at study hall or with a tutor, but as a sophomore the study hall becomes optional.

Kaplowitz recalls study hall as helpful and the tutors as partners to work with.

Although tutoring services for all student athletes have been available for over two years, this "cottage industry," has undergone many changes, according to Ed Suglia, director of Academic Coordination.

Suglia's program was created to offer prospective tutors the opportunity to earn three graded credits in a human service class, given in conjunction with the School of Education.

By requiring the tutors to go through a training course, Suglia believes this "provides quality control," gives student athletes well-trained, capable tutors.

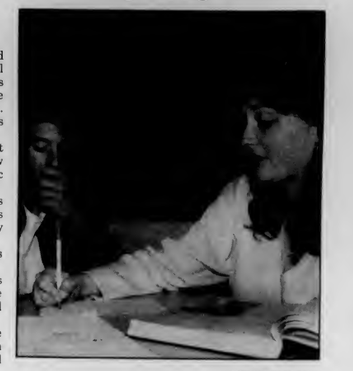
More than 100 student tutors are expected to participate in this year's program.

Freshman women's basketball team member Kim Gregory said the tutoring "helps me to adjust."

Gregory said tutors answer questions and help guide her through her homework. "It is so much easier with tutors," she said.

Mike Berthiaume believes that being a tutor is more than helping students do assignments. He gives study hints and aids students in learning how to understand lectures.

Melissa Cellucci, who tutors for the men's lacrosse and football teams, said tutors are needed in all areas. She said she believes that because the tutors are students too, they "know the demands of school."



MATT KAHN/COLLEGIAN

Bill Vellios, a freshman business major and member of the University's baseball team, is tutored by senior communication major Colleen Joyce.

There are other benefits as well, Suglia explained. The University saves money because the Athletic Department no longer has to hire the tutors.

But he feels it should be the University's responsibility to set up and run such a program.

"It is fundamentally wrong for us to provide the tutoring program," he said.

Suglia explained his job is to help athletes register for classes, provide academic and career counseling and to act as a referral for campus resources.

Suglia hopes that eventually the program will be taken over by another department in the University.

Egyptians honor dead of WWII battle

By MIMI MANN
Associated Press

EL-ALAMEIN, Egypt — The battle that raged at El-Alamein half a century ago is considered among the most crucial of World War II, but its larger effects weren't much on the minds of veterans marking its anniversary.

Instead, they thought about such details as a dead friend's voice.

"He laughed a lot. Always laughing," Jim Mallot said of Doug Ingram, as he cleaned the desert dust off Ingram's grave with a bottle of mineral water.

Mallot was among the thousands of combat veterans, war widows and relatives of the fallen who came to this desolate Saharan village to commemorate the battle that stopped the Axis march through North Africa.

The fighting took place on a 40-mile-wide stretch of desert between the Mediterranean and the vast quicksand fields of the Qattara Depression. Field Marshal Erwin Rommel, the "Desert Fox," was trying to pass through the narrow stretch to reach the Suez Canal and Egypt's rich oil fields.

The battle extracted a staggering toll: 72,500 killed, wounded or captured — 13,500 of the British Commonwealth forces and 59,000 Germans and Italians.

Japan jilts American business

By JIM ABRAMS
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — American businesses are being kept out of Japan's huge foreign aid program despite Japan's claims that it is among the most open in the world, a U.S. scholar says in a new book.

American University professor Margee Ensign, in Doing Good or Doing Well, disputed Japanese figures showing American and other foreign businesses winning an increasing share of contracts from Japan's official development assistance program.

She said Japan's ODA, the largest in the world in 1991 at $11 billion, is still structured to give lucrative contracts to Japananese businesses.

"Although the Japanese aid program has become more open on paper, it is closed to non-Japanese companies in practice," she wrote.

Japan says that 84.5 percent of its 1990 ODA loans were totally untied, meaning the recipient nation was under no obligation to buy Japanese goods and services for an aid project.

But the Japanese Overseas Economic Cooperation Fund, which implements Japan's aid programs, could come up with few foreign firms that won contracts from 1986 to 1990, said Ensign, who made repeated requests for the information.

Wealthy give millions annually to charities

By JEFF DONN
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. — Like many workers, Chuck Collins sometimes grumbles about his salary and worries about scraping together $100 to fix the car.

But to Collins, such cares are relatively new. As a member of the Oscar Mayer Wiener family, he gave away his entire inheritance to promote social change.

He is one of thousands of Americans who donated small or large fortunes to further their ideas of a better world and, for many, relieve guilt over their own good fortune. Activists say such social-change philanthropy has resisted stock market crashes, the recession, and even the me-first ethos of the 1980s.

"Wherever I look around at the world, I see so many problems, that sitting on a mountain of money creates a problem in and of itself," Collins said.

Collins' great-grandfather, Oscar Mayer, was no doubt trying to eke out a living — not advance social justice — when he opened a Chicago butcher shop at the turn of the century. He and his family succeeded. Today, the company's hot dogs sell in supermarkets and baseball parks across the country.

Collins, who was raised in the well-to-do Detroit suburb of Bloomfield Hills, said children of affluence are "fed a whole lot of myths" by their families as they grow up: "People have worked hard. They've taken risks and succeeded. They're smarter."

But he said he began to question his family's wealth in the wake of the 1967 summer riots in Detroit. "I noticed that poor people tended to be black, like our housekeeper . . . who came from downtown Detroit to work at our house."

As a young man, Collins came to Worcester to work at a crisis intervention center and later joined a voter education project. "I began to realize how hard it would be for poor people to stop being poor. Meanwhile, I could see that people of privilege my own age felt that the sky was the limit," he said.

In 1986, Collins finally decided to give away his whole $275,000 inheritance and accept the limits of working people. He contributed about 40 percent to the Funding Exchange, a New York City-based network that funnels major donations to activist causes around the country. The rest went to similar groups in New England and the South, as well as a peace fund in Amherst.

His father objected so strongly that Collins now declines to talk about his family's reaction to his decision.

On Sunday, war widows walked row after tow of sun-blasted memorials looking for the men who never returned. A woman in black cried and rubbed her palm again and again on a memorial wall bearing thousands of names of men with no known graves.

A convoy of World War II German and Italian staff cars cruised along the dusty coastal highway from Alexandria toward Alamein's battlefields. A German veteran in a touring cap and goggles eagerly waved to passerby.

The battle that was commemorated was actually the second at El-Alamein. The first, in August 1942, ended after four days when Rommel pulled back.

Choice may not improve schools

WASHINGTON (AP) — There is little evidence that allowing parents to choose their child's school improves learning, according to a study that says the best way to enrich education is to focus on quality rather than location.

"Instead of providing choice only among schools, why not create choices within schools," the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of teaching said in a study released today.

The concept of school choice is favored both by President Bush and Democrat Bill Clinton as it applies to public schools. Bush would go further, providing government financial assistance for parents who want to send their children to private schools.

The foundation study, however, found that 82 percent of those interviewed would rather see improvements to their neighborhood public schools than choose another for their children to attend.

South Mountain, a neighborhood high school in Phoenix, was cited in the report as overcoming in-school violence and a soaring dropout rate by creating more choice for its students. It divided into five speciality schools, gave teachers time to tutor and make home visits, toughened its educational standards and provided on-campus social work programs.

Thirteen state legislatures have adopted choice plans, and 21 others have considerred them, the study said. Minnesota instituted the first program in 1987; laws offering choice are scheduled to take effect in Michigan and Ohio next year.

this year from its 2,500 donors, said Collin's views are typical of wealthy contributors who kept giving more each year throughout the 1980s.

"In spite of the 80s, the Reagan years, and the sluggish economy . . . we are still getting donations from people," said Dion Thompson, a staffer at the Funding Exchange. "They feel that the work we do is even more necessary because of the things that have happened."

Author Christopher Mogil, who co-wrote "We Gave Away a Fortune" to highlight people who donated at least $100,000 for such causes, estimated that roughly 10,000 such donors contribute $1 billion annually in the United States.

Student leaders battle in election debate

CHRISTOPHER EVANS/COLLEGIAN
"The only reason people in Arkansas support Clinton is to get him out of the governor's office." — Kevin Jourdain of the Republican Club.

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

Two local partisan leaders sparred yesterday in a vigorous debate over the upcoming presidential election as the raucous audience interjected comments without restraint.

Neil Carpenter, president of the University of Massachusetts Democrats, suffered fierce blows from the former president of the Republican Club, Kevin Jourdain.
He also withstood a mostly Republican audience of about 50 people, as he defended Clinton's record and platform yesterday in the Campus Center.

Bush's economic plan, according to Carpenter, has failed the American people for the last four years. "We have a choice of a failed past or a bright future," said Carpenter. "His plan will help people help themselves, not cater to the rich."

Jourdain countered by defending Bush's strong economic plan and said the economic state of the country is not as bad as the Democrats say it is. "We need a program for working on the problems — not a silly liberal idea," said Jourdain.

"Bush has driven the economy in a ditch," said Carpenter. "We're working harder for less. To blame it on the sixties is a bunch of bologna."

The debate was moderated by Malaika Higginson, president of the University Debate Club. Each representative was asked six questions by Higginson, one question from each other and direct questions from the audience. The debate was sponsored by the University Debate Team and the Student Affairs Enrichment Fund.

While Carpenter paused for a few seconds in between questions, Jourdain interrupted him, mistaking his "elongated pauses" for a completed thought.

"At least I think before I talk," Carpenter answered.

Experience is what Jourdain said is Student uses new tactics to sell condoms

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

When junior marketing major Paul S. Edelman started working at Condomania Incorporated in Greenwich Village, New York, he was so excited with selling condoms that he decided to start his own business at the University of Massachusetts. Condomania on Campus was born.

"I had a proposal to bring condoms here to make more safe sex. [Condomania tries] to make it more comfortable to buy condoms, instead of in a drug store," Edelman said. "We will be here all semester two to three days a week [on the campus concourse]."

By buying his supplies from Condomania Incorporated, Edelman is able to offer in addition to real condoms, novelty items, such as glow in the dark condoms to lollipop condoms.

The glow in the dark condoms are $3 each; the lollipop condoms are $1.5.

Senior marketing major Gregg Oginz, who also works at the table, said the lollipop condoms and the condoms in a nut are popular items. Oginz said, pointing to the condom hat on his head, that it was also popular.

Since Edelman started his business on campus two weeks ago, he said the public's response has been positive.

Edelman hands out a questionnaire, asking if anything on the table offends, to on-lookers. Edelman also questions in the survey if the table makes people more aware of AIDS, and if makes the purchase of condoms easier.

Senior theater major Rob Corddry was one of the many curious passers-by. Corddry found the condom display colorful. Others found it to be entertaining.

"It's doing really well," Edelman said.

"Lots of people are amused by it. People are just looking," Oginz said. "Our goal is to protect the campus and at the same time make a small profit. Our whole table is based on sexual awareness from AIDS and other sexual diseases."

Although some students were amused with the condom table, others said they felt uncomfortable with the idea of selling condoms in the campus concourse.

"I just don't think it should be publicly displayed," sophomore English major Suzanne Pouliot said.

Although Pouliot said she felt that it was important issue for people to have safe sex, she said she found the novelty items to be too commercialized.

In addition to selling condoms on the campus concourse, Edelman plans to have a campus condom mail order catalogue, for those he said could be too shy to buy condoms in public.

Oginz said they hope to bring in speakers to talk about safe sex.

"I want Condomania to be available in every University across the nation," Edelman said. "[Amherst] is a test market."

Rabies dangerous for cats, dogs

Infection frequency growing in Massachusetts

BY CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

Cats and dogs in Massachusetts are in danger of coming down with rabies, according to two health department experts.

Cats are at the greatest risk, because cats keep the same habits as raccoons, who are the main carriers of the disease, according to Director of the Amherst Health Department Bettye Anderson Frederic. Cats, as with raccoons, hunt at night.

"[Students] can help cut down on their pets getting rabies by getting their animals vaccinated. We are particularly interested in getting cats vaccinated," Frederic said.

Frederic also suggests students to write or call home to encourage their parents to vaccinate their pets. Cats, unlike dogs, are not legally required to have a rabies shot.

Despite scientists' expectations of the disease spreading from the western and southern borders of Massachusetts, many of the rabies cases have been detected in eastern Massachusetts, according to the University's Office of Environmental Health & Safety's Senior Environmental Health Specialist, George H. Reed.

Although Reed and Frederic said no dogs or cats have been found with the disease in the area, both said these pets have a high chance of catching the disease.

Rabies is a disease that infects the central nervous system. Since the disease is carried in the saliva, it is usually transmitted through a bite.

The infected animal will be acting very strange, according to Frederic. Reed said if rabie symptoms develop in humans, than the disease is fatal.

Eleven cases of rabid raccoons have been found near the Fitchburg area, Reed said.

Reed said he encourages students not to feed wild animals, because the animals will start to live closer to humans.

"Raccoons like to live close to humans, so people should be concerned about it," Reed said. "It is a disease of an over population of animals. There is plenty of food for them. [Raccoons] are cute, but they can be a nuisance."

Reed suggests to keep garbage containers secure, since raccoons are attracted to refuse. Reed also recommends that if people get bitten by an animal, they should wash the wound with soapy water, and seek medical attention immediately.

The best advice is to stay away from wild animals, according to Reed.

Frederic said this Saturday two local veterinarians are having a rabies clinic for cats and dogs. Dr. Michael Katz in Amherst will be hosting the clinic from 11:00 a.m. to 12 p.m..

Dr. Ted Diamond in Hadley will be hosting the clinic from 1:oo p.m. to 2 p.m. The vaccination fee will be $8.00 per an animal.

WMUA holds annual fund raising drive

By ERIC STEINHILBER
Collegian Correspondent

The student-run and funded radio station of the University of Massachusetts, WMUA 99.1 FM, is looking for donations for their yearly telethon. Their goal for 1992 is $16,000 and they appear confident in their quest.

"We've already made about $10,000," said Matt Williams, programmer,"I estimate that by Thursday we'll reach our goal."

Williams added that their Polkathon which was held on the first day was a twelve hour show which brought in over $8,000, the biggest money maker so far.

"I was nervous the first day because of the economy," said Roubina Surenian, telethon coordinator, "But I felt that the economy was getting better so I raised the goal by $1,000".

Surenian said so far the telethon has sucess. "At this point, we're three days in and we've already reached $10,000, so I think in the end it's going to be very successful".

Throughout the week of October 24th, each disc jockey solicits contributions from listeners during their radio shows which feature a variety of music.

In addition to Saturday's Polkathon, WMUA is also featuring a jazz block which has raised almost $700 and an oldies block, a new idea this year, has proved to be a successful addition to the telethon lineup.

WMUA has also been giving away various prizes and gifts including gift certificates, posters, CD's and cassettes.

going to save the country. "While Bush is helping people, Clinton is running around like a chicken with his head cut off. The only reason people in Arkansas support Clinton is to get him out of the governor's office," said Jourdain.

Expounding on Bush's experience, Jourdain said, "While Clinton was in diapers," Bush was bringing down communism fighting the Cold War. He said Clinton isn't even internationally known except for when he went to demonstrate against his country on foreign soil.

"It's over. The Cold War is over," emphasized Carpenter who said Clinton would concentrate on the economy.

On the environment, Jourdain defended Bush's record stating that "not one inch of wetland" was lost during his term and that Arkansas ranked last in the nation on the environment. "Clinton has no appreciation for the woods," said Jourdain.

"Bush has flip-flopped but hasn't had the courage to flip-flop to the public," said Carpenter on Bush's environmental record and said the Clean Air Act was initiated by congress and not a "wandering aimless Bush."

Both candidates were asked why their vice-president is better than the opposition's.

"Wow, that's a tough one," answered Carpenter. He said Quale doesn't even trust a woman to make a decision about her own body and said Gore is out working with people.

"I'm the first to admit Gore is out there, but where?" asked Jourdain, adding that Quayle is a strong vice-president.

Answering a question about why abortion should be outlawed even if the woman is raped, Jourdain said Bush didn't support this.

"It's the platform," Carpenter interrupted, arguing the idea that the government knows best and a woman does not.

One questioner from the audience asked Jourdain several questions. He accused Bush of allowing his co-pilots to be shot down during his wartime involvement and called the Republican party the "party of liars."

"Does the University security know you're in the building?" Jourdain asked the questioner. He said Bush was scared to death to go [to war], but went nonetheless. He said it is Clinton who's the draft dodger and asked why people should go if the president won't.

"I wish he would draft the domestic issue," said Carpenter. He said again that the war is over and that Bush's character flaw is that he lies about other's records.

Carpenter got his share of questions from the audience as one questioner asked why Clinton accepted donations from top polluters in his state. As the audience became more disruptive and boistorous Carpenter asked who was running the debate. "Is it just because he's [Jourdain] bigger and stronger?"

Jourdain said Clinton would be an "absolute abomination" on gun control. But Carpenter said Clinton supports a seven-day waiting period before purchasing guns.

Concerned that society would become completely agrarian, one questioner belittled the increase of rice and chicken farming jobs in Arkansas.

Carpenter said people like having these jobs. "I don't like the elitism here," said Carpenter.

As the audience again became boistrous Carpenter said "I'm glad to see the audience is objective open-minded republican club members."

■ tutors

Until then Suglia and his staff will continue to oversee the tutors.

Julie Ricardelli, one of four interns working in the Academic Coordinator's Office, typically works an eight-hour day and returns in the evening to run one of the team's study halls in Boyden, where most of the tutoring takes place.

With the new program the amount of referrals is six to seven times greater than last year, Suglia said.

He said the increase can be attributed to the efforts made to reach each athlete individually.

"They see that the kids are getting help when they need it, not when it's too late, " Suglia said.

Each sport holds its own study hall Sunday through Thursday, and most coaches require freshmen and transfers to attend these study halls.

Suglia denies that any athletes receive a "free ride" or that tutors arrange special privileges for athletes through their professors.

"Tutors have no authority except for what they tutor," Suglia said. Any instance where a professor allows an athlete to not complete all required work is not condoned by the Athletic Department, he said.

Under Athletic Department policy all student athletes are allowed to make up any tests or assignments missed due to practice or games.

Suglia added that the athletes work "very hard on their academics." When the softball team went to the College World Series, they took their semester finals in a hotel room.

Student athletes say they are dedicated to both their classes and their sport. The lacrosse team's captain Rick Mullins said he and some of his teammates "load up" on credits in the fall, because of travel during the season and his hectic schedule.

"It's hard to take a lot of classes during the spring," Mullins said. "If there's a class you really need, try to do it in the fall."

Kaplowitz said some of his football team members take night classes so that their academics do not suffer.

But Kaplowitz does not see himself missing out on anything because of sports.

"Anything sports-related can help your career goals, and you get good coaching on the game of life, not just your sport," Kaplowitz said.

Ross Perot gives hope for true change and true leadership

David RIVERA

They come from all over. Young and old, rich and poor. They're of many racial backgrounds. At one time they called themselves Democrats, Republicans and Independents. They have few things in common, except next Tuesday those of us looking for true change will cast their vote for Ross Perot.

For many Americans, this is not just another election. It's a pivotal point in changing American politics and everything wrong with it. A great many think this may be our last chance. Our last chance to turn things around.

My Dad has been a Democrat all his life. Watching the debate the other night he reminisced with pride that President John Kennedy was the first ever to receive his vote. He also remembered with sadness that Robert Kennedy would have received one also. "They were true leaders," my dad said. "Bush and Clinton are just the opposite."

My dad has worked hard all his life, and I weigh heavy his advice and comments. He expressed feelings a great many Americans are dealing with. It's a sadness, deep and painful, that has permeated the country over the last 20 years. Loss of jobs, loss of homes, and worst of all the loss of hope has brought many Americans to the brink of despair. As we near the election, people become more and more discontented with both parties and what they've done to the country. Voters hear the rhetoric everywhere, on the campaign trail, television and radio. They don't what to hear it any longer.

Bush says things aren't so bad.

"These pessimists," he calls us with contempt.

He's quintessential bureaucrat, out of touch with reality and the American people. He's forgotten the urban poor, the working class, people of color, and, with his stance on abortion, he has forgotten women. Bush and Washington have simply forgotten what the needs of the country truly are.

The local democratic well-to-dos held a Clinton rally pondside last Thursday. Crammed inside a huge tent, they yelled and cheered, as if Clinton were the new messiah. He isn't. If he gets to Washington he'll play the same old game. A friend of mine suggested, "Hold your nose, and vote for Clinton." I'm tired of holding my nose during elections.

At the rally a bunch of local politicians lined up to speak. It's election time, and true to their trade, they appear only when in need of our votes. One by one they got up and blathered. But basically they used the same rhetoric that has been used against us again and again. I left and found myself cheering the Perot supporters banished outside.

Where were these "democratic leaders" a couple of weeks ago when this campus was about to explode with racial tension? Where were they a few years ago when we went on strike to protest the drastic cuts that have nearly destroyed this school? Where were they? Not here.

You don't have to go to the cities to see how bad things are in this country. Take a short walk over to Whitmore. Watch the students seeking assistance at the financial aid office. The lines, resembling add/drop dimensions, start forming about an hour before the office even opens. One by one students wait in line, hoping they can get the help, financially, they need so they can afford their education.

Most of them come from blue-collar families. A great majority are students of color. And most feel abandoned by a school and a system created by bureaucrats. Some won't be able to come back next semester let alone next year. It's in this cloud of despair that some of us hope for true change.

I don't know if Perot has all the answers, but most of us believe he's an honest man with integrity. That alone sets him above the others. I'm giving Ross Perot my vote, as will millions of other Americans fed up with the two-party system that has failed countless times. We hope for true change; we hope for "true" leadership. Ross Perot gives that hope.

Give 'em hell Ross.

New menu of cause du jour

Luke ERICKSON

Ever wonder what UMass will be like once you're gone?

No, not when you're dead; after you've left. My friend Ed is getting just a little taste of it this year as he spends his senior year in Spain. Me? I'm Ed's connection to UMass.

Dear Ed:

Hola mi amigo! Que pasa? The Happy Valley is pretty much the same, and this semester has its own menu of cause du jour. There are some interesting stickers floating around, quoting deposed and departed administrators commenting on last semester's events but unfortunately, they have all the validity of Adolf Hitler saying, "You're a loser."

There is a new addition for Sarge's Takeover Tour. You remember, the walking tour around campus that describes each and every building that has been taken over, when and why. For the fall of '92 it's Memorial Hall, taken over by protestors demanding that the Columbus Day holiday be recognized by a series of teach-ins stressing the racism and genocide that the Columbus discovery created.

The protestors also demanded 40 scholarships for low-income women of color. I like the idea myself, but I see little correlation to Columbus Day. I guess protestors can be like legislators and attach riders to their demands.

Personally, I saw it as a chance to catch up on my homework, while most of my friends went home for the weekend. I'm a little nervous that anarchist could decide to blow up Whitmore in protest over the lack of celebration of Guy Fawkes Day. They'll have to take a number behind thousands of disgruntled students, however.

In Southwest, an RA was assaulted for enforcing the pathetic and fascist housing policy on alcohol (yes, it is possible to both respect and hate authority — see "Full Metal Jacket" for a more complete story). The offender was a visitor, and admitted to the crime. UMass police issued a trespass notice, banning him from campus. The RA in question was an African-American. A few days later, a racial slur, misspelled and grammatically incorrect, was scrawled by the RA's door, a demonstration of not only how narrow but how shallow the cowardly offender's intellectual capacities are.

Somehow it was concluded that the two incidents were directly related, and a mob descended upon the floor of the visitor's host. The administration broke up the crowd by promising that the hosts would be expelled from Housing. It's sad to see that the University expects us to treat our guests like children and to take responsibility for their actions rather than dealing with the offending persons directly. Oh well: same crap, different semester.

The UMass sports teams are doing quite well, if having a winning record in every sport and sitting at or near the top of every conference standing is doing well. Midnight Madness is this week, and the season just a little over a month away. Too bad we won't be able to go to the NCAAs together, like we did last spring. But don't worry, Ed, you'll hear about every game ASAP, even if I have to write the story myself.

Take it easy, big guy. And UMass says, "Hi."

Reviewer gave poor performance

I have recently been made aware of a review of the Pink Floyd cover band The Machine, written by Dakkan Abbe [Collegian, Oct. 20]. I feel some misconceptions need to be addressed.

First, the band started on time, as per arrangement with the Pearl Street management. Since the venue closes at 1:30 a.m., and the band plays two 60-70 minute sets with a brief intermission, the 10:30 start was appropriate.

It is polite to introduce yourself as a member of the press. To my knowledge, no one in the band or the crew was aware of your reviewer's attendance. Consequently, assumptions were made that the band was deliberately wasting time by socializing with the crowd.

The first song was "Signs of Life," which flows into "Learning to Fly," from the album Momentary Lapse of Reason. A Pink Floyd fan would know this. The reviewer seemed particularly upset that "obscure" material was being avoided. The band's repertoire includes material from nearly every recording Pink FLoyd ever made. It is a band policy never to repeat a set in a given venue. Consequently, such nuggets as "Bike" or "Interstellar Overdrive" don't get played every night. We will have to ascribe this to luck of the draw. However, the underlying sentiment that the Pink Floyd material played on the radio is somehow inferior to the earlier or less-played compositions is simply elitist snobbery.

Simple math would demonstrate that to earn a million dollars a year, 365 shows a year would have to pay $2,739.73 each. Again, a little investigation would have avoided this ridiculous assumption.

We have always looked forward to performing in the five college area, from our first shows at Katina's three years ago to more recent gigs at Riverside Park, Gepetto's and Pearl Street. Everyone is welcome at our shows, and this policy will continue unabated, including members of the Collegian staff. However, next time please exercise a little journalistic integrity.

A lesson from Chinese history

I am Chinese and there are a lot of reasons for me to be proud of my cultural heritage. I hope people can realize that China has been one of the most powerful countries in the world for many centuries. The Great Wall has symbolized protection for our civilization from the "barbarians" for thousands of years. The power of Genghis Khan established the largest empire in the world's history when he conquered all the lands to the Black Sea.

But about 150 years ago, Chinese pride suffered a severe blow when the "barbarians" from the West dominated our country. The cannons of the West could not be matched by our backward military and the lure of the opium trade was too strong to be overcome. This domination undermined China's belief that it was the most civilized race. Although China was weakened by this dominance, the Chinese wanted to maintain cultural pride and pure "Chineseness." After nearly 80 years of killing, resistance and frustration, the Chinese finally cried out the slogan, "Open our eyes and learn from the West," and, "Down with Confucianism!" This period of enlightenment changed our nation dramatically. We established our national industry, modern army, hospitals and museums. We overthrew the last puppet emperor and drove off all the imperialist powers from China. In 1949, we declared to the world, "From now on, Chinese people stand up forever!"

History has taught the people of China that isolation, ignorance and the decay of the feudal system caused our country to become enslaved by an outside power. I discovered if I kept an open mind, my life could be enriched by such things as American music, literature and arts. I have decided to study Western philosophy and history so I can better understand my own culture. I can become stronger if I try to learn from another culture.

Being Chinese, I am glad to see that we are learning this lesson from history: to have enough courage to break the Great Wall by ourselves! We have the possibilities before us to create a new history. In China at this moment there is a feeling of change. Mao in his famous poem "Snow" says, "from the Great Wall I gaze inside and beyond and see only vast tundra."

The people of China are confident the world will see more of our glorious civilization — a country full of ups and downs, joys and sorrows, good and bad times. The world will watch and see!

Impeachment came down; Collor is out

By CHRISTOPHER ROGERS
Collegian Correspondent

On Sept. 29 the Chamber of Deputies, the lower house of Brazil's Congress, voted by 441 votes to 38 in favor of impeaching its president of two years, Fernando Collor de Mello. Technically he is now suspended for 180 days while the case goes to the Senate for trial.

Why was the 43-year-old president of South America's largest democracy kicked out of office? Collor's downfall began in May as a family feud.

His younger brother Pedro denounced him in the press as the "front man" for Paulo Cesar Farias, a businessman from the Alagoas region of Brazil. "P.C.", as Farias is known in Brazil, was accused of running a vast bribery ring inside the government. Within three months a congressional investigation had confirmed the story.

It found that Farias had exploited his friendship with the president to extract millions of dollars in bribes from businessmen seeking government contracts. In return, Farias transferred money to Collor through secret bank accounts. What did Collor do with the money? Buy a palatial estate in Rio? No. Buy an island in the South Pacific? No. Stash the money in a Swiss bank account to pay for the increasing costs of an American education for his children? No.

He spent $2.5 million of it sprucing up his family's gardens. Then again, $2.5 million in Brazilian cruzeiros will be almost worthless in time. Inflation has been running at more than 20 percent a month.

Ordinary Brazilians were unamused. Collor had, after all, spent more than two years lecturing them on the virtue of belt-tightening.

Since his election in March 1990, the real wages of federal employees have fallen by half, and the minimum wage is worth less than it has ever been since its creation more than half a century ago.

News Analysis

On top of that unemployment has soared during the global economic slowdown and consequently the GNP of Brazil in 1992 will be lower than it was in 1986, in nominal terms, which is a terrible sign. However, there is some cause for delight in Brazil — which explains the honking of cars and yells of joy all around. Is Pele coming back to play for the national team? No, the impeachment came down.

The citizens of Brazil were happy because the deputies had at least exercised the powers vested in them by the Constitution of 1988. They had struck a blow for clean government, without fear that the generals who ran the country from 1964-1985 would come marching out of their barracks. Above all, they had listened to, and acted on, the overwhelming wish of the people.

Under the constitution the new president for the interim at least, is Collor's ex-vice-president, the 61 year-old Itamar Franco.

Franco is a civil engineer and a career politician from the mountainous mining state of Minas Gerais. He has a spotless reputation (one columnist has gone so far to call him a "slave to high ethics"). But he also carries some of the pro-labor, anti-competition ideological baggage that many other Brazilians have abandoned and can do nothing but hinder a countries economic growth.

With an open market for global competitors to compete in, like IBM or Toyota for instance, quality will improve and prices will go down for consumers. New plants and factories will also create jobs which Brazil desperately needs.

However, Franco is in no position to make economic policy all his own. As a gentleman-politician without a party, he will have to bend the will of the opposition coalition that organized Collor's impeachment.

Fortunately, all members of the coalition, including the parties of the left, say they want to persist with reforms to cut state spending and expose the economy to foreign competition- which can only help the continent's biggest economy in the long run- and hopefully stop the bleeding, politically and economically in the short term. Good Luck Mr. Franco.

Election controversy

Angolan vote not recognized

The National Electoral Council said on Tuesday that it was suspending the announcement of results in Angola's first multiparty polls in apparent attempt to head off new violence in the war shattered country.

Facing defeat in the elections by UNITA, the leftist party former rebel chief Jonas Savimbi has cried fraud and withdrawn his men from the newly unified forces formed under the May 1991 peace accords.

UNITA's joint commander of the new Angolan army, Arlindo Chena Pena "Ben Ben" said Unita did not want to resume its 16-year war with the ruling MPLA (Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola), called for three demands to be met to "avoid the worst."

Among the demands was that no more results of the September 29-30 poll be announced. The electoral council, which has challenged Savimbi to provide proof of fraud, said it would suspend announcement of results while it counted the final ten percent of the votes. A provisional final result will be released within a few days.

Meanwhile, the United States, Savimbi's former backer in the civil war criticized him for rejecting the outcome of elections judged free and what was considered fair by more than 800 international observers.

"This is an unfortunate step which is not in accord with the spirit or letter of the Angoalan peace accords", said Herman Cohen, U.S. assistant secretary of state for Africa on the Voice of America radio.

With more than 80 percent of the vote counted, Savimbi had 39 percent, with President Jose Eduardo dos Santos hovering over the crucial 50 percent threshold that would force him to face a potential run-off against the rebel leader Savimbi.

The MPLA has 55 percent versus UNITA's 33 percent in the race for the 223 seats in parliament.

Savimbi has once again charged the government with fraud, ballot-stealing and intimidation. But Savimbi's accusations also failed to impress Angola's former colonial ruler, Portugal.

A spokesperson for the Portuguese government overseeing the elections, said in a statement it "considers unacceptable the taking of any position which attempts to alter the situation arising from implementation of peace agreements by force or any other inappropriate pressure."

Rediscovering Africa; it's not just a jungle

When I first arrived in this country, as a college freshman, I was overwhelmed as most people are, not only by UMass, but also by the U.S. since I had never lived here before.

I found it to be understandable that most Americans I met knew very little about Africa or its geography, since the U.S. itself is such a vast and diverse country.

This was the excuse I gave for some of the questions I was asked, such as: whether we still lived in huts and communicated by drums.

Isatou
BOJANG

Of course, I would reply that those belonging to long-established tribes still do, but that the majority of African countries have enjoyed significant development in a relatively short period of time.

When I speak of development, I'm referring to technological advancement since this is the only criterion by which the western world measures other countries. It should not surprise me then that I am asked such ignorant questions since Americans in general are conditioned to regard the rest of the world in relation to their set standards.

Many people need to realize that the world can not be viewed from a single lens and a whole continent can not be deemed inferior simply because it does not fulfill the categories established by some all-knowing force called the western world.

Unfortunately, the remnants of colonialism are still deeply ingrained in African society to a point where we feel that we have to 'catch-up' with the west in order to be so-called "civilized". We should pride ourselves on our history and cultures instead of chasing an ideal which if we stopped to analyze, would understand has many imperfections.

It is time for the stereotypes to be discarded and for a balance to be set up between the images of Africa as a disaster-ridden, helpless continent and the notion held by many that it is one big safari park. There is so much more to the continent than these images represent and so much diversity among countries that goes unmentioned, that perhaps it is time for many to be re-educated about Africa and its peoples.

When thinking of Africa, envision a continent not only with its share of problems, but also one of diversity and extremely rich culture. Take time to discover the many wonders of this continent that is still known as 'the jungle'.

Death as a child's toy; starvation in Somalia

For the past several months, thousands of people have been dying in Somalia. The devastation caused by the four years of civil war has been exacerbated by drought and the slow response of the international community. Finally, after months of warnings and requests from local NGO's, the relief effort has begun.

However, it is estimated that at least one thousand to two thousand people per day, mostly children, continue to die in Somalia. The main cause of death is starvation and disease.

Hassan
MOHAMED

While the current relief effort has alleviated some of the suffering, much more needs to be done. According to a recent UNICEF report, "up to 95 percent of Somalis aged under 10, between 750,000 and one million children are suffering from malnutrition."

For half of these, malnutrition is rated as severe. Unless large scale food, medical, and sanitary aid is forthcoming in the next two months, 1.5 to two million lives are at immediate risk."

Most relief workers agree that not enough has been done. There are few feeding centers and the existing ones attract more people than they can help.

The overcrowded camps become breeding grounds for disease caused by lack of sanitation facilities. It is feared that the rainy season will exacerbate the situation.

Clearly, in addition to the urgently needed food and medical aid, long-term reconstruction and development work needs to begin in areas such as agriculture, clean water and health care.

A recent article in the New York Times reports, "Despite the misery inside the town of Baidoa, two Somali agricultural experts working with the relief agencies said the situation in the outlying regions could be salvaged by the prompt delivery of seeds to farmers who had remained in their villages.

" Regarding the need for medical facilities, the same article stated that "im-

Drop in attendance mars weekend SF convention

By KIP MANLEY

Not Just Another Con 8
Lincoln Campus Center
October 23-25

I have always been a fan of science fiction and fantasy, or speculative fiction, or whatever the correct buzzword is these days. But I've never been a fanatic about it. Nonetheless, I found myself spending this weekend with a crowd of people, who take their enjoyment of these genres very seriously indeed.

Escapism is big business these days, and science fiction and fantasy are escapism taken to the nth degree. Star Trek: The Next Generation has the highest ratings of any show in syndication and is already spawning a sequel series, Deep Space Nine. The Science Fiction Conventioneers of UMass (SCUM) organized the convention.

Role playing games have never reached a wider audience and even begin to approach art with such games as Vampire and Ars Magica.

Science fiction and fantasy are the only pulp genres left that can maintain a respectable number of national magazines devoted to publishing short stories.

A convention like NJAC is a way for the fans and professionals to come together and celebrate these accomplishments. It's like a gathering of the tribes. As people come from all over the nation (and even the world) to meet and greet each other, they swap stories and share their enjoyment in the imaginary worlds they love so fiercely.

The others drawn to a convention such as NJAC is, as I said before, are because of escapism. Nowhere have I seen an environment more conducive to and supportive of a constructed identity. All it takes is the bare bones of a costume and a new name and you can become someone else. Simple as that. In this day and age, the lure to be from another world or another time is undeniable.

Unfortunately, this year's convention suffered a drop in attendance. Due to a lack of on-campus publicity, and late mailings to members and guests, attendance dropped from 400 last year to 237 this year. And, while large amounts of fun were had by all, quite a few of the planned events suffered.

Some of the panels of professionals were larger than their audiences, and more than one devolved from the structured topic to personal conversations with the panel. And the small attendance lent an intensely insular air to the occasion, as quite a lot of the crowd already knew each other, leaving outsiders (such as your writer here) feeling somewhat out of the loop.

"Things did kind of go to hell this year," said Brian Johnson, a member of SCUM.

Johnson said it has merely underscored what the organization needs to do better.

"Next year we're going all out on publicity, we're recruiting from other cons, doing radio and newspaper ads," Johnson said. "We're gonna see 700 or 800 people next year."

But for that to happen, more people are going to have to get involved. A lot of old SCUM members are graduating or moving on to new things, and they have to be replaced with new blood. NJAC also has to expand its audience, to try and draw in more than just the hard-core fans.

Rock and roll and jam with the cool Samples

The Samples

By BILL ROGERS
Collegian Correspondent

At Pearl Street tonight there will be a band that is guaranteed to pump you up and make your evening complete.

The Samples, a reggae/rock quartet from Boulder, Colorado, will literally blow you away. The Samples' music is easy listening, according to them — excuse me, my mistake — it's easy to listen to.

The subtleness of the music is merely a disguise. The music the guitarists Sean Kelly, Al Laughlin and Andy Sheldon dish out, with the help of drummer Jeep Macnichol, contains some of the most powerfully sizzlin' music in contemporary rock and roll.

It all started in 1990, when they were signed to Arista Records because of the superb quality of their self-recorded demo, which they later released as an LP. After finding out that Arista had no clue about what the band was trying to do with the album, they decided to hit the road.

With the confidence necessary to make it in the music business, the band became a member of the elite class of performers with no label. The band had experienced hardship before — the name of the band originated from the fact they were once forced to live on just samples from supermarkets in Boulder.

They were soon picked up by What Are Records? Ltd., a New York based label with radical and innovative ideas in marketing and distribution.

"It's nice to know that we didn't have to change or compromise anything," Kelly said. "Now we won't have a record company or an A&R person

Flower Thief steals the show with an energetic performance

By KIP MANLEY

Flower Thief
Iron Horse
October 25, 1992

It was cold outside on Sunday night, and the wind was thrashing the trees in an autumnal frenzy, but the inside of the Iron Horse was warmed with a blast of Indian summer straight from the heart of Flower Thief.

"We were getting sick of just playing in the living room," said Chris Geisler, the guitarist, of their gruelling practice schedule before the show. "Once you play for other people, you can't get enough. It becomes an addiction."

One of those addictions that is good for you, it seems. Despite a somewhat shaky start, the band lapped up the energy of the audience and used it to grow steadily in assurance from song to song until they were flinging that energy back into the crowd tenfold.

That shaky start was perhaps due to the fact the band has recently run a major marathon — the integration of new member Amy Green. Over the course of four weeks, they wrote five new songs and rearranged 20 old ones.

"It's been an exercise in practicing patience," Green said. "I'm trying to bring improvisation to the band."

Green said she loves avant-garde free jazz. Geisler called the experience an "emotional roller-coaster" and said the band has "always been so structured. We've been afraid to cut loose."

Not any more. Flower Thief ranged widely last night, from the delicate loveliness of "Calling My Own" ("Our only cover," said Geisler, introducing the song. "My grandmother wrote it") to the thrashing grind of Amy Green's "Black Shoes" ("I'm a recent convert to drums," she said. "I can't wait to get them under control") to the bouncing glee of "Shopping Cart Joyride."

"I always used to only write songs only when I was depressed," bassist Jen Gallahorn said. "So ["Shopping Cart Joyride"] is about how it's okay to be happy and to be in love and to write songs about it. Dammit."

The older songs shone as well on Sunday. Gallahorn's punchy bass and Geisler's guitar were as tight as their vocal harmonies, while Green added a solid base with her enthusiastic drumming. It was when she picked up one of her flutes or the melodica that she really stood out. Green's bandmates and the audience gave her more than one astonished look during her solos.

Flower Thief's excitement at performing was so great they only waited through a few moments of applause before bouncing back on stage for an encore.

"We're not terribly familiar with encore etiquette," Geisler said. "Is it okay if we play another song?"

The crowd roared; it was more than okay.

Flower Thief is definitely in it for the long haul. When Jen graduates from Hampshire and Amy from Smith this winter, there will be a January tour of the South followed by a return to the Valley to record a new album. And this summer they're going to go for a nationwide tour.

"It's easy for a woman to just be an inspiration for someone's art, to be flattered by that attention," Geisler said, speaking of a song she wrote about the relationship between Nausicaa and Ulysses. "I mean, there's no reason she couldn't have her own odyssey."

And, that was the most exciting thing about Sunday's concert — the realization that this was just the beginning of an odyssey for Flower Thief. Or, to quote from their song "Fortune Cookie" — "The master plan has finally began/The plan that only little girls and spiral notebooks know."

come in and screw around with all of our songs trying to fix things that aren't broken."

On their album, No Room, the Samples successfully send their messages, with songs that are as diverse in culture and rock, reggae and country rhythms as they are in texture, feeling and attitude. They attempt to create an album that combines the richness of good music with the depth of philosophy enough so you'll be excited and impressed from beginning to end.

The show is one of many on the Rock The Vote Tour, "a non-profit, non-partisan organization founded by members of the recording industry to encourage 18-24 year olds to become involved in the process of democracy as a response to the relentless attacks on freedom of speech and artistic expression."

The Samples will be at Pearl Street nightclub in Northampton tonight at 8 p.m. Tickets are $7 in advance and $9 at the door. The show is those over 18.

Glengarry Glen Ross: brutal and comedic

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Searing and brutal comedic drama was never so desperately beautiful. In Glengarry Glen Ross, from James Foley (After Dark, My Sweet), the stakes have never been so high and yet so poetically scummy. The grifters here are both the swindlers and the marks — they're victims of themselves.

Director Foley takes David Mamet's Pulitzer Prize-winning play and basically does not screw it up. Mamet, who wrote The Untouchables and directed the acclaimed House of Games and last year's Homicide, is in high form in Glengarry. His maze-like dialogue and textured pacing are wonderfully machiavellian.

The plot (what there is of it) is simple yet loaded. Four salesmen — con men, really — sell swampland as valued real estate. Their livelihood is based on "leads," names of suckers who are easy targets.

When a v.p. from downtown (Alec Baldwin) announces a sales contest. The first prize is a Cadillac, the second is a set of steak knives and the third is you're canned. Glengarry is set in a dizzying 24-hour period in which the office is burglarized and the glengarry leads, a list of "sure things" are stolen. The film unfolds as the culprit is revealed and the desperation of the characters crystallizes and ultimately shatters.

The cast of salesmen are strokes of genius. Al 'acino is Ricky Roma, the one on the winning streak, who is a master of deceit. He wines his marks with liquor and gains their trust. Shelly Levine (Jack Lemmon) is an over the hill salesman who prime has past and is on a losing streak.

Ed Harris (The Abyss) is the short-tempered one, who tries to cajole, even blackmail co-worker Alan Arkin (The Rocketeer) into stealing the glengarry leads. Their interplay is a portrait of grifters victimized by themselves and their line of work.

Director Foley lets the characters work in a tight ensemble, each performance compliments and interlocks with another, although Mamet's script allow each of the actors a chance to shine. Lemmon has the time of his life in a part he seem destined to play. It is no coincidence that the part has Oscar written all over it. Lemmon is exquisite, he has not been this good in a while.

Pacino shows smarmy charm as Roma. His scenes with a mark (Jonathan Pryce) who wants his money back glide with desperate tension, as Roma pulls out all the stops to steady the mark against the clock. It would be easy to skip over Pacino's performance — it is amazing as usual.

Both Harris and Arkin work wonders with their roles, their portrayals are slithering portraits of men who are reduced to their tempers and complaints. Kevin Spacey (Consenting Adults), as the firm's supervisor, brings weaseless to new lows.

Glengarry's profanity sings, it is plot layers cross like Shakespeare and the performances soar. David Mamet is now a man to be reckoned with; his script is intense and glorious. Glengarry Glen Ross is prime American filmmaking at its finest.

proved medical care should be the priority in Baidoa now that food is being distributed in town and at more than 40 villages in the countryside.

At the moment, the only health facilities are at the town's one hospital, which is without running water, and two clinics."

While it is true that some of the food, medicine, and other supplies sent to Somalia are looted, the aide must continue. Food is getting to the hungry, one way or another. The present chaotic situation cannot be an excuse for ignoring one of the greatest humanitarian crisis ever. Instead, new and bold tactics must be used to remedy the situation.

World organizations and nations can find ways to assist Somalia and they must; particularly in the light of their part in the creation of the present situation. The death and destruction caused by the fighting and drought in Horn of Africa cannot be pushed aside while world attention focuses on Eastern Europe. The Somali people also have a right to life.

However, along with efforts for re-establishing farms, clinics, and other basic services, the larger issues need to be addressed.

Order and security must be restored so that workers can feel safe. Bringing order out of the present chaotic situation will also require the intervention of the UN, in the form of a peace-keeping force.

The first 500 troops, all Pakistanis, are slowly arriving but they will be deployed only in the capital city, Mogadishu.

This is an example of too little, too late. More troops are needed to escort food convoys to the remote areas and to restore stability in the food distribution operations.

The resolution of the situation in Somalia requires a firm and long-term commitment on the part of the UN Security Council and the international community to help in the recovery and rehabilitation of the victims. We must sustain our efforts as an entire generation is dying from civil war, starvation and disease.

Pressure on the UN, the US administration and others must continue. The present media attention is not enough. Personal involvement in the way of letter writing, telephone calls, fund raising, and forming long-term organizations of support are also necessary.

Please participate in up-coming Somalia relief-related events in your community or help organize one.

Bartlett's Quotations lists newest members

By MARTIN FINUCANE
Associated Press

BOSTON — Nelson Mandela made it. But so did Kermit the Frog.

The 16th edition of Bartlett's Familiar Quotations, first published in 1855, includes plenty of new voices to join Shakespeare, the Bible, Milton and T.S. Eliot, in a collection that spans more than 4,000 years.

Some are statesmen, thinkers and writers, following the dominant Bartlett's vein.

"You'll find a great deal of unorthodox material in this book," said Justin Kaplan, a Pulitzer Prize winning author who spent two years editing the book, with an eye on contemporary phrases. "I've tried to make the book a great deal more down to earth."

Mandela, the long-imprisoned leader of the African National Congress in South Africa, was included, saying "Only free men can negotiate; prisoners cannot enter into contracts."

But this year many of the new faces come from the movies, TV, and popular music.

So Kermit, the character from the Sesame Street children's show, opines, "It's not easy bein' green."

Other contributions come from Jimi Hendrix, Elvis Presley, John Lennon and Paul McCartney and Bruce Springsteen. Among Woody Allen's selections, "It's not that I'm afraid to die. I just don't want to be there when it happens."

Yogi Berra's contributions included, "When you come to a fork in the road, take it."

Many selections were added from popular songs, such as "We are the world", written by Michael Jackson and Lionel Richie, and The Doors' "Come on baby, light my fire."

From a 1981 speech at Yale University where she talked about women succeeding in areas previously closed to them, Gloria Steinem is quoted saying, "Some of us are becoming the men we wanted to marry."

Kaplan, 67, who lives in a comfortably unkempt house on a back street of Cambridge near the Harvard University campus, won the Pulitzer and a National Book Award for his 1966 biography of Mark Twain. He won another National Book Award for his 1980 book about Walt Whitman.

"I think of it as a book of record, as a cultural montage," Kaplan said. "It's a fairly unique repository of the recorded word."

But forget any notions that he led a phalanx of crack researchers, wielding checklists, in monitoring modern culture to produce the book.

Kaplan describes editing Bartlett's as a modest, homespun process, in which he worked alone in his study, using friends as unofficial advisors.

He said the project is "one person's take" and issues a disclaimer: "The book is never going to be definitive. I hope it's authoritative and reliable . . . its basic ingredients — that is, usage and familiarity — change every day."

But Mark Starr, Boston bureau chief for Newsweek magazine, said Kaplan was open to input from other people.

Johnny Orr. Their backcourt of Justus Thigpen and Ron Bayless is long on experience and ability. The ugly Julius Michalik is a long distance threat in the frontcourt. The Cyclones' balance is their greatest strength.

Oklahoma, a team UMass beat handily last year (86-74) and visits this year, is usually a strong club and this year should be no different. Billy Tubbs has center Bryan Sallier, forward Jeff Webster, and guard Terry Evans back. The big question will be if someone can replace guard Brent Price in the backcourt.

Nebraska should be a tough team as well. Center Derrick Chandler is a rugged inside player for Danny Nee. Forward Eric Piatkowski complements Chandler with his overall game.

Big Eight Also Rans: Missouri, Oklahoma State, Colorado, and Kansas State.

All Big Eight: Center: Sallier (OU), Forward: Hancock (KU), Forward: Jevon Crudup (Missouri), Guard: Walters (KU), Guard: Thigpen (ISU).

Great Midwest: This is a conference on the rise. Cincinnati captured the hearts of many last year. Memphis State will do some big damage come this year.

Memphis State is revived, thanks to Larry Finch. Finch has people recalling glory days of Keith Lee in the mid-eighties. Anfernee Hardaway is a talent too good to describe. Hardaway gets help up front from the strong David Vaughn. Two other starters return for Finch, who will be having some fun in March.

Cincinnati had a dream year last season, making the Final Four. Coach Bob Huggins is one of the top young coaches in the game. Despite losing three starters, Huggins still has a strong squad. Shooting guard Nick Van Exel is a player, plain and simple. Three of the top reserves return for the Bearcats, making their losses that much easier to swallow. Cincinnati will be battling UMass at Springfield come January.

Marquette is long on experience with all five starters returning. Their experience is a big plus when it comes to their con-topping defense. Balance is the key word when it comes to the Warriors' offense. Four of their starters averaged double figures last year. The go-to guy for Marquette is junior center/forward Damon Key.

Great Midwest Also Rans: UAB (UMass should meet them in the Abdows), DePaul (UMass will meet them at the Centrum), and St. Louis.

All Great Midwest: Center: Key (Marquette), Forward: Vaughn (MSU), Forward: Hardaway (MSU)(He has to play somewhere), Guard: Van Exel (Cincinnati), Guard: Terry Davis (DePaul)

Now it's time to return to my weekly column features that have taken a vacation. They are back.

Dunce of the Week: This award goes to NBC Sports. After listening to ex-Bear Dan Hampton provide color commentary for the Pats-Browns fiasco, I realized that there is a place for me in the sports world. Hampton could not put two thoughts together, let alone two sentences. The one great thing Hampton did do was after the Browns took the lead at the end, Hampton said Dick Macpherson, ". . . looked like he saw a bus hit a [pause for thoughts] street vendor." That is one of the best things I have ever heard. However, to NBC sports, how can you let a cro-magnon like Hampton on the air, you bunch of dunces!

Obscure Fact of the Week: Ronnie Grandison finished 6th in the CBA in rebounding last year with 10.0 a game.

Women's X-Country grabs A-10 title

By JASON NASH
Collegian Correspondent

Usually, people try to jump on a bandwagon before the team hits greatness. If you are looking to hop on one, forget about the University of Massachusetts women's cross country team because their train just left town.

Saturday, at the A-10 championships in Van Cortlandt Park, Bronx, New York UMass won the A-10 championship for the second year in a row and added yet another win to their undefeated regular season. In addition, the win wrapped up coach of the year for UMass skipper Julie Lafreniere.

"I'm very happy (about coach of the year)", said Lafreniere."I have my team to thank for being so outstanding all year."

While going in highly favored, the Minutewomen were not themselves. Four runners were sick including Mo Meldrim, Kim Liljeblad and Becky Johnson.

Junior Kelly Liljeblad finished first for UMass and second overall to Rutgers Alicia Guiliano who set an Atlantic-10 record with a 15 second margin over Liljeblad. On top all the sickness, Liljeblad sprained her ankle with a mile left on a very decrepit course.

"New York's economic troubles have left them unable to put much work into the course," offered Lafreniere. "Last weekend 8,100 people ran of the course making it very run down and quite dangerous."

Rounding out UMass' top five were Kim Liljeblad (5th), Johnson (7th), Julie Moreau (11th) and Meldrim (13th).

With the UMass team losing their lead, Meldrim provided a burst of inspiration by screaming to her teammates ahead of her to pick up the pace. Riding on the emotion in the process Meldrim propelled herself from seventh to fifth.

"Mo has been on penicillin for a week now and hadn't run for five days," said Lafreniere. "She and all the girls really ran their hearts out."

While Saturday was very successful fro UMass, they now must look ahead to the New England Championships on Friday and then the ECAC's on November 14 and at the same time must deal with the condition of the team."

"We are very happy to win to win the A-10 championships, it really means a lot," said Lafreniere. "Luckily, we do have three weeks to recover from all these injuries. Our main goal is to be one of the two teams selected to the Nationals at the ECAC's"

Water polo goes to 23-1 with win over Army

Luke Harlan rises over a defender in Saturday's 18-10 win over Brown. The two wins raised the water polo's record to 23-1.

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

While the University of Massachusetts football team was swimming its way around McGuirk Stadium Saturday afternoon, the water polo team was swimming around Amherst College's Pratt Pool, making two more opponents look silly.

The Minutemen increased their record against varsity teams to 19-1 in a 18-10 pounding of Army, in a game not as close as the margin indicates. They increased their overall record to 23-1 in a 16-5 victory over Boston-Metro.

It was a weekend in which the 14th-ranked Minutemen needed to both relax and play a game or two to stay sharp. This weekend UMass will travel to Brown University in search of the program's first New England Championship.

It was also the last area appearance of the UMass seniors.

"It seemed to me," UMass coach Russ Yarworth said, "that for some reason it brought the team back together. There's been a little bit of tension and I think that was a response to the pressure of the end of the season coming up."

"The kids had a good time this weekend. Everybody played. We were relaxed and playing the game, and that's what you have to do once in a while. There's a lot of pressure right now because we're getting down to that time of the season where a loss . . . well, we know what it can mean."

The Minutemen went out to a 5-2 lead after one period and 9-4 at the half. The shoot-out continued as UMass outscored the Cadets 6-2 in the third period in route to the eight-goal winning margin.

"It was hard for us to get consistency, because I was playing so many kids. We played the starters in the first quarter and started putting in other guys," Yarworth said. "Not that they're worse players, it's just that it wasn't a consistent group. I was subbing too much to acheive cohesion."

UMass' leading scorer Javier Gonzalez had a monster game, scoring five goals. Tsan Engin scored three times, and seniors Scott Reed and Scott Deluca added two each. Senior Jay Peluso scored once, as did Jeremey ALters, Rich Schragger, and John Luviano.

Reed and freshman Fransisco Mariani each had three assists, and senior Dan McOsker added two. Senior goalie Todd Hourihan collected seven saves.

GAME NOTES - The Minutemen scored their 18 goals on only 23 shots, raising the team's shooting percentage on 493 shots to an impressive 56 percent.

"I don't think we've ever been above 50 percent this late in the season," Yarworth said. "It's nice."

College hoop preview looks at Big Eight

This week I will continue with the college hoop scene. This week I am hitting the Big Eight and the Great Midwest. What no Big Ten? That con is being left to another Collegian writer, look for it, probably later this week. As MC Serch would say, here it comes:

Jeff
CROFTS

Big Eight: This conference has a prohibitive favorite in Kansas. There is some depth, but not as much as in the past.

Kansas is my pick to be cutting down the nets in New Orleans. The backcourt of Adonis Jordan and Rex Walters is unparalleled. Up front Richard Scott and Eric Pauley add intensity and toughness. The big addition for Roy Williams is juco superstar Darrin Hancock. Hancock is going to amaze all with his athletics and overall game.

Iowa State (a UMass victim last year. 71-51) returns all five of their starters back and that bodes well for the Cyclones' coach, the entertaining

UM equestrians jump to the top

Despite rainy skies and a muddy field, the UMass Equestrian Team made a triumphant showing at Saturday's Intercollegiate Horse Show at Hadley Farm.

Eleven colleges were represented at the day-long show, including Amherst College, Mount Holyoke College, Holy Cross, Williams College and Smith College. UMass, managed by Wendy Cicciu, was the high-point team of the show with eight first-place winners, nine 2nd-place winners, five 3rd-place winners, six in 4th place and four in 5th place.

Captain Heidi Seebeck said the team is proving itself more and more with each show.

"We are so excited," she said. "Last week we were second, now we're first. But we're always in the top three."

Ramona Petrillo, an Open rider, said "We're having a ball. We're ecstatic with the way the whole team is doing, and we're having fun on top of it."

In first place were Carol Noll in Intermediate Horsemanship on the Flat, Class 5A; Teya Geiger in Intermediate Horsemanship Over Fences, Class 8A; Ramona Petrillo in Intermediate Horsemanship Over Fences, Class 8B; Susan Shallcross in Open Horsemanship on the Flat, Class 6C; Meredith Kelly in Walk-Trot, Class 1B; Betty Adams in Advanced Walk-Trot-Canter, Class 3D; and Madeline Feely in Novice Horsemanship on the Flat, Class 4D.

Second-place winners included Kelly Monohan in Open

The madness returns on Saturday

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Get ready for the madness.

If you have been waiting since March for the return of the University of Massachusetts basketball team, your wait is almost over.

Because at 12:01 a.m. Saturday night/Sunday morning the Minutemen will take the Curry Hicks Cage court for their first practice of the year.

"It is great event for our fans and players to celebrate the upcoming season," team manager Brian Gorman said.

Following last season's Sweet Sixteen appearance, this Midnight Madness may be the most eagerly awaited in its four year history at UMass.

The Cage doors will open at 9:30 p.m. and the festivities will include the give away of a free UMass poster to the first 1,000 fans, a three-on-three tournament, a free raffle drawing for two free round trip tickets on USAir to Florida and a foul shot contest for money.

The night will not only provide fans their first opportunity to see the 1992-93 Minutemen, who are ranked No. 19 in Dick Vitale's Basketball and No. 20 in NCAA Magazine, but also a chance to celebrate Halloween.

New NCAA rules pushed back the first practice date from Oct. 15 to Nov. 1 and UMass has responded accordingly.

This year the team will hold contests for the best Halloween costume and the best UMass fan costume. Also, a Coach John Calipari look-a-like contest will be held.

The deadline for signing up for the three-on-three and the foul shot contest is today. You can sign up on the Campus Center concourse at the basketball table. The final round of the tournaments will be held at Midnight Madness.

At midnight the Cage lights will dim and, Chicago Bull style, each player will be introduced. What follows will be a short scrimmage and a slam dunk contest.

The evening will conclude around 12:30.

SPORTS NOTICE

The basketball office is now accepting entries for the Midnight Madness three–on–three basketball tournament and foul shot contest.

To enter, please sign up at the men's basketball table on the Campus Center concourse, which is open from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. The deadline to enter is TODAY!

The preliminaries for the three–on–three tournament will be held on Wednesday, October 28 at the Curry Hicks Cage, and final rounds will be held on October 31 before Midnight Madness at the Cage.

UMass learning disabled attack Housing policy

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

Several learning disabled students are filing complaints with the University because Housing Services refuses to waive the additional cost of their single rooms, said a junior political science major.

David Shea, a learning disabled student, said he is medically required to have a single. "It takes me a longer time to learn and I need my own space to be able to concentrate," he said.

Shea said he became aware this August he was paying the regular rate for a single room. He said University lawyers are reviewing the legality of the policy to determine whether Housing has the legal right to waive the fees for physically disabled students and not learning disabled students.

Housing Services Director Joseph Zannini said he heard about the complaints several weeks ago and has had a staff member working with an attorney on the issue. "Our attorney has told [Housing] that our policy is fair and appropriate," he said.

Zannini said Housing gives priority for singles to learning disabled students, but expects them to pay the money for the room just like all the other students.

Patricia Silver, head of Learning Disabled Student Services, said Housing has done a good service giving accommodations to learning disabled students, but she doesn't know if their policy on single room fee waivers is equitable.

"I feel uncomfortable telling students to just accept Housing's policy, so I tell them if they don't feel good about it, they should check the policy out," Silver said.

Shea said even though Housing gives learning disabled students priority to single rooms, their fee waiver policy is inexcusable.

"Housing does not have the right or privilege to violate the law and pin one group against another just to make a quick buck," Shea said.

Zannini said if students were disappointed with Housing's decision to charge learning disabled students the required cost of a single room, they should talk to him.

Zannini said the students should give him any other information they have that would prove Housing's policy inappropriate and unfair.

"I would be more than willing to work with their attorneys. Students must realize the decision isn't final," Zannini said.

Silver said Housing's policy on fee waivers effects

Weld criticizes Clinton tax plan

Says Bush not to blame for Mass. unemployment rate

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. William Weld charged Tuesday that a Clinton administration would cost Massachusetts jobs, but he said the state's soaring unemployment rate over the last four years wasn't President Bush's fault.

Rather, Weld said, the state's unemployment — which was 3.3 percent in January 1989 and 8.6 percent last month — was the fault of former Gov. Michael Dukakis.

"We're not out of the woods, but we're going in the right direction," said Weld, chairman of the Bush-Quayle campaign in Massachusetts.

With the election a week away, Weld blasted as "cockeyed" the Arkansas governor's plan to raise taxes on families making $200,000 or more. He and Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci, Bush's New England campaign chairman, also took indirect shots at Clinton's trustworthiness

"Clinton has consistently waffled on this issue. Is it because he doesn't know where he stands, or is it that he deliberately is deceiving the American people?" Celucci said.

Boston Mayor Raymond Flynn, one of Clinton-Gore's national co-chairs, responded later, saying that "for Gov. Weld to call Bill Clinton's economic plan ruinous is one more example of the Republican pot calling the kettle black."

"What could be more ruinous than the loss of 400,000 jobs in Massachusetts since George Bush took office?" Flynn said.

Bush signs bill to release JFK assassination material

By JOHN DIAMOND
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush signed a bill Tuesday requiring government agencies — including the FBI and CIA — to release secret material on the assassination of President Kennedy.

Amid a furious campaign schedule, Bush penned the so-called JFK bill into law in Paducah, Ky.

"I sign this bill in the hope that it will assist in healing the wounds inflicted on our nation almost three decades ago," Bush said in a statement issued following the signing. Bush expressed concerns that the law may erode his constitutional authority to control executive branch secrets.

But he said, "I fully support the goals of this legislation."

The law sets down the guidelines for Congress, executive branch agencies, and government research centers such as the National Archives and presidential libraries, to release a mountain of still-classified material on the Nov. 22, 1963, assassination. The material includes everything from top secret intelligence reports to news clippings and tax returns.

Documents that agencies refused to release would be reviewed by a five-member commission appointed by the president. The commission would have the power to make public the disputed materials. In the case of executive branch documents, the president could overrule the commission and withhold documents but only by showing that "grave harm" would result by their release.

One exception written into this law is the file of photos and X-rays taken during the atopsy of Kennedy. The material would remain confidential and access would be controlled by the Kennedy family.

Bush complained that the law lacks specific language allowing him to withhold documents from public view if they concern executive branch deliberations and law enforcement methods. The national security exceptions were also too narrowly drafted, Bush said.

Armageddon this week claim religious groups

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

BOSTON — Don't make plans for the weekend.

The end of the world is drawing near, according to a national religious movement that predicts the final reckoning will occur between now and Saturday.

"Some people don't believe," said Lee Ihn-Kyung, spokeswoman for the Taberah World Mission, whose 16-year-old leader reportedly received a revelation that Jesus Christ would come this month for Judgment Day. "But many people believe. It's all up to them how much their minds are closed to God."

The "saved," or born-again Christians, will be swooped to heaven in the so-called rapture. All others will be left behind for seven years of tribulation, at which time human history will end, according to the revelation.

It's not the first time someone has predicted the end of the world. But this is a sophisticated Armageddon; it's being announced in advertisements in The New York Times and in brochures tucked under the wipers of parked cars in major cities.

"The fact that these expectations are out there is kind of common now," said Thomas Wangler, a professor of theology at Boston College. "And there's much in the Bible to inspire it. But the kind of rationalization and modern advertising campaign they're using, that's new to me."

At least three groups are behind all the publicity: the Taberah World Mission in Skokie, Ill., the Maranantha Mission in Los Angeles and the Mission for the Coming Days in Derry, N.H. Some advertisements also have been sponsored by the Korean-based Coming of Christ Mission.

All are affiliates of the Korean Mission for the Coming Days Church, according to the Watchman Fellowship, a Christian cult-monitoring.

Korean authorities last month arrested Lee Jan-rim, a leader of the movement, charging him with swindling his followers of up to $4 million. Prosecutors said he had $380,000 worth of bonds with maturities as late as next May, well after his predicted doomsday.
